Strange to say, the Royal reconciliation has been made the subject of public parade and pomp. The Heraldo is filled with a detailed account of the ceremonies on the occasion. The King entered Madrid in a Royal carriage, drawn by six horses, and preceded by piqueurs. The carriage, besides the King, contained Marshal Serrano, the Duke of Rianzares, and the Duke of Valencia. On each side of the carriage rode on horseback the General Roncali, Captain-General of Madrid; M. Loigorri, the Political Chief; and General Llanres de Barron, the Governor. The carriage was followed by those of the King's household followed; and the procession closed with a strong escort of cavalry. The people who assembled to see the procession shouted and laughed. On the arrival of the party at the Royal Palace, the King and Queen, at the foot of the grand staircase by the Court and Ministers in full uniform; and, in the hall of the halberdiers, the Queen, surrounded by the ladies of the Court, received his Majesty. The sentiments of the Queen on seeing the couple together, and, after a very short interview, the King and Queen each retired to their own apartments.

The following is the version given by the Pays of the reception of the King by Queen Isabella:—"At the moment when the august consort of the ba cony, situate at the angle of the Palace opposite the street of Bayion, through which the King's escort arrived. Next to the Queen stood the Infanta Luisa de Sesas, who had succeeded in the Queen's love with her husband, to meet her brother When the King reached the square of the Arsenal, and alighted before the principal gate of the palace, the President of the Council, and the Legats of the Cortes, came to approach the Queen of his arrival. Her Majesty then advanced with visible emotion towards the door of the Royal chamber, where she received her august Consort in her arms. Their Majesties remained some considering a short time, and when they reappeared, their faces were radiant with satisfaction, and they addressed to M. Brunelli and General Narvaez their warmest thanks."

The Illustration upon this subject represents the arrival of Queen Christina at the palace at Madrid; with the grand staircase, of noble design. It is said, when Buonaparte ascended these steps, that he told his brother Joseph, "Vous serez prince aujourd'hui." He did his hands on one of the white marble lions, exclaiming, "Je la tiens enfin, cette Espagne, si désirée!" So spake Cæsar, on landing, "Teneo te, Africa." But the French, like the Romans, at last, discovered that Spain is a morse easier to be swallowed than digested. Vorst Hand-book.

PORTUGAL.

We have advices from Lisbon, by the Bulon frigate, to the 14th inst.

Count Bomfim, and his companions in misfortune, were landed at Lisbon in safety from the Terrible, without any demonstration having been made either by the Cabralists or Patulea parties.

The registration, whether by fair means or foul, was going so hard against the Septembrists, that their Committee have formally protested to the Queen; and they are discussing the propriety of recommending their adherents not to vote at the approaching elections.

Lisbon was perfectly tranquil, but reports of riots having taken place at Oporto are current.

Discount in paper money had advanced to 37½.

ITALY.

The negociations between the Duke of Lucca and the Archduke of Tuscany have ended in the abdication of the Grand Duke of Lucca. The agents employed in this negociation were Mr. Ward, an Englishman, on the part of the Duke of Lucca, and M. Bomfil on the part of the Grand Duke of Tuscany. As an indemnity for this cession of territory, the Grand Duke of Tuscany is to pay to the Duke of Lucca an annuity of £48,000, until the duchies of Parma, Piacenza, and Guastalla, now held by the Archduchess Maria Louisa, shall descend to the latter Prince, which they will do, in virtue of the treaty of Vienna, on the demise of the Archduchess.

The act of abdication of the Duke of Lucca, dated Modena, the 5th instant, and ratified by the Hereditary Prince, was published at Florence on the 11th, with a mots progres of the Grand Duke, announcing the incorporation of that duchy with Tuscany.

A letter from Naples, of the 11th, asserts that John Andrew Romeo has neither been killed nor captured; but was still, at the date of the last accounts, at the head of the insurgents in Calabria.

Letters from Rome of the 9th confirm the reports of the German journals, that the Pope, not satisfied with the evacuation of the city of Ferrara offered by Austria, and the restoration of the status quo, demands the evacuation and surrender of the citadel of Ferrara and the fortress of Commachio, both of which Austria has occupied since 1818. In consideration of compliance with this demand, the Pope offers to cede to Austria all that part of the Duchy of Ferrara which lies on the left bank of the Po, and which would naturally belong to Lombardy.

SWITZERLAND.

No actual collision has yet taken place in Switzerland, but matters continue to wear a most threatening aspect. The Grand Council of th canton of St. Gall has voted in favour of coercive measures for the dissolution of the Sonderbund and the expulsion of the Jesuits. The latter give the Government and the Liberal party a majority in the Diet, which was to meet on the 18th; and there is now no doubt that the Diet will at once prepare to enforce its resolutions, so that we may soon expect to hear of a civil war between the parties.

On the other hand, the Austrians are preparing to interfere, if they should find a favourable opportunity. The Austrian troops have already made a formidable movement on the Tyrol frontier, and the whole of the Swiss frontier is now lined with troops, from Lago Maggiore to the Lake of Constance.

A letter from Berne dated the 16th of October, shows that preparations for resistance are also making on the part of the Sonderbund.

There seems good reason for supposing that the three Northern Powers, acting in accord with France, will interfere in the affairs of Switzerland. The intervention will be intrusted to Austria and France, and the other two Powers will aid and assist them. This extreme decision is not to be adopted until an appeal shall have been made to them by the Sonderbund. The Powers regard such an appeal not only as a justification for an intervention by virtue of the Treaty of Vienna, but likewise as a duty.

On the 9th, 500 men entered Constance to provide for the safety of the inhabitants, as the country people from Thurgau had threatened to burn down the town. On the morning of the 11th, the sharpshooters from the Thurgau marched towards the frontier of St. Gall, to stand by the Government in case of an attack upon it by the people.

According to the Allgemeine Zeitung, the representatives of the Foreign Powers to the Swiss Diet will take up their quarters at Constance, in case of a civil war in Switzerland.

A letter from Schwyts of the 12th, says that one of the Liberals there was murdered by two of the opposite party, after a discussion on Swiss politics. The murderers gave themselves up to the authorities. On the 16th, a grand pilgrimage was to be made to Einsiedeln. The police director of Berne has issued a circular, forbidding the clergy to allude to politics in the pulpit.

THE NETHERLANDS.

The Session of the States General was opened by the King of the Netherlands, at the Hague, on Monday. His Majesty gave a satisfactory account of the state of the country. A great part of it was merely of local interest. The King, among other facts, informs the Chamber that, during the past vacation, no extraordinary circumstances have arisen to introduce any change into the general situation of the country. The Netherlands continue to maintain good relations with other Powers. Order has not been disturbed in our transmarine possessions. The measures found necessary for the introduction of a new system of legislation into the East Indies, in harmony, as much as possible, with that of the mother country, have been already partly put into execution.

TURKEY AND GREECE

We have received, by Trieste, intelligence from Constantinople to the 30th ult. The dispute between Turkey and Greece was likely to be arranged; propositions to that effect having been made by M. Glarski, the successor, ad interim, of M. Coletti. Meanwhile, the measures against the coasting trade have been carried into execution, and the Porte has given official notification, official or unofficial, with the Consul-General of Greece. The insurrection in Albania is not losing ground: the chief of the insurgents, Djoulcka, it is said, lately applied to the Greek Government for reinforcements. This circumstance has induced the Divan to address a note to the representatives of the Five Powers, informing them of the demand, and stating that, though it believes the Greek Government to be far from inclined to listen to such a proposal, yet it thinks it right to state what has reached it, with a view to preventing the Greek Cabinet from ever thinking of such a project.

The cholera contained to rage at Trebizond. The Turkish Sanatory Board though t necessary to submit all vessels coming from that town to a quarantine, which takes place at the Dardanelles.

Our accounts from Athens are to the 3rd inst. The King and Queen had returned to Athens from their excursion to Thebes. The Opposition journals attack the Ministry with great violence. The Esperance was seized on the 3rd.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

By the arrival of the Falcon, we have journals from Graham's Town to the 8th, and Cape Town to the 15th of August. Speaking of the state of matters on the frontier, the Graham's Town Journal, of the 7th August, says, "The past week has been warm, dry, and favourable to the part of the Kaffirs, or of hostile movement on that of our troops. Both seem to be preparing for a coming struggle, in which it is probable that the policy of the Kaffirs may be more scientifically framed by their willow than the oak. They will probably bend to the storm, and by that means evade the mischief which might be the result of open, unflinching resistance. While, however, the warlike professions of the contending parties lain in a state of comparative repose, there has been "a war of elements," a severe storm having swept over the British camp on the Buffalo, with such terrific power as to excite among all within the range of its course the most serious apprehension.

THE WEST INDIES

The Clyde arrived at Southampton on Thursday, with the West India mails. The dates are, St. Jago de Cuba, 19th September; Jamaica, 25th; Hayti, 25th; Puerto Rico, 27th; Dominica, 29th; Barbadoes, 30th; Trinidad, 30th; Barbadoes, 5th; Grenada, 29th; St. Vincent and St. Lucia, 26th; Martinique, 27th; Montserrat and St. Kitt's, 28th; St. Thomas's, 1st of October; Fayal, 15th.

By this arrival we learn that the islands generally were healthy, and the weather favourable.

A shock of an earthquake had been experienced at Trinidad and St. Lucia. The state of the money market in England had caused the West India banks to restrict their operations.

Port au Prince continued in a frightful state of disorganization, the blacks having possession of the palace and the fort.

The Clyde brings a mail from Monte Video, taken from a schooner at Fayal.

THE OVERLAND INDIA MAIL.

The Overland Calcutta Mail arrived on Thursday, with letters and papers from India and China. The dates are—Calcutta, Sept. 9; Bombay, Sept. 13; Madras, Sept. 15; and Hong Kong, Aug. 25.

This mail left Bombay on the 11th ult., instead of the 18th, as formerly, and some dissatisfaction had been felt at this anticipation of four days. The news by this arrangement is rather unimportant. The last intelligence from India was to the effect that a conspiracy was in progress in Lahore. The British authorities, being aware of its existence, resolved to crush it in the bud, and at nine o'clock in the evening of the 20th of August, Runjeet Singh Chunda, the Queen Mother of Dhuleep Singh, the young Maharajah of Lahore, was taken from the palace and conveyed under an escort to Shaikhopura, a fort about twenty miles distant, in which former delinquent princesses were confined. The intrigues, in a political sense, as well as otherwise, of Ranee Chunda have been notorious. One of the last was her causing her son, the Maharajah, to publicly put Tej Singh, the Prime Minister, by placing the mark on the Royal mark on the forehead (called the tilak), at the time of his installation as Rajah. This intrigues was at the head of all the disaffected in Lahore, and her general power will have the effect of breaking up many of their schemes—at least for a time. The Prime Minister, Tej Sidgh, is a decided friend of the British, and therefore the object of much hatred to the ex-Queen and her partizans. The British officers are on the alert. The troops at Lahore being highly paid, are to be changed annually, in order to give equal benefit to the various regiments in the north-west of India.

The most dangerous period of the year at Lahore is the Dussera, which takes place in October; but the utmost vigilance is observed by Sir John Littler and all the troops under his command.

Tranquillity continued to prevail on the banks of the Indus, although some symptoms were exhibited of a willingness amongst the Beloochies of the hills to resume their old practice of plundering the plains. Nothing was known in Bombay of the intentions of Sir Charles Napier. Much speculation was afloat in consequence of a report received from England that he was to be named Commander-in-Chief of the army in India, on the retirement of Lord Gough.

From Affghanistan and Sir Robert Sale there is no remarkable intelligence.

The Governor-General was stated to be about to proceed to Oude, in order to enter into arrangements with the King, who is described as willing to cede the sovereignty to the East India Company and to retire, upon his being insured a pension commensurate with his rank.

The disorders in the Nizam's dominions continue unallevated. India in general is tranquil.

The chief item of intelligence from Bombay relates to the discussion respecting the memorials sent to the Court of Directors from the young officers of the Indian army. The Chairman of Sir Robert Oliver, who has long held the office of Superintendent, was much canvassed.

The rains, which set in with such fury in the beginning of the monsoon, had become slight, and ceased altogether by the end of August; but, in the beginning of September, they recommenced, and a very favourable season would, it was hoped, ensue throughout India.

The last mail arrived from England in 97 days and 18 hours; much the most rapid transit ever accomplished.

There is nothing particular to notice in commercial affairs

The accounts from Hong-kong are to the 25th of August. The Peninsular and Oriental steamer Pekin had arrived on the 10th, with dates from London to the 24th of June. The news of the Canton expedition in April having thus just been received and published in London, speculation was rife upon its future, and the next coming mail was looked to with great interest, as likely to develop the views of the Government. All remained quiet at Canton, but there was an uneasy feeling still existing.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

DESTRUCTION OF CHARTLEY HALL, THE SEAT OF EARL FERRERS.—Shortly after twelve o'clock on Tuesday morning, a fire broke out at the above seat, which (with the exception of the servants' apartments) has been reduced to a heap of ruins, together with the furniture, library, and armoury. The fire was first discovered by Mr. Leadbetter, the butler, who was awoke by hearing a sort of crackling noise, as if some persons were attempting to break into the mansion. He dressed himself as hastily as possible, and upon going from his bedroom, he discovered that the house was on fire, and that the flames were bursting from the drawing-room windows. Expresses were immediately sent off for the fire-engines from Uttoxeter and Stafford, and about three o'clock the Stafford engine, accompanied by Mr. Wollaston and assistants, arrived; but the fire had gained such an ascendancy, that all that could be done was to save the servants' apartments, and it appeared that no engine was kept at Uttoxeter. So great was the heat of the fire that, upon looking over the ruins, the swords from the armoury were found blended together, and the lead was one solid mass. It is reported that the property is insured, but to what extent could not be ascertained. The mansion had lately been under repair, and the noble Earl was expected there in about a fortnight, from Staunton Harold.

SUICIDE OF A CLERGYMAN, NEAR LIVERPOOL.—On Sunday afternoon, the Rev. W. Gray, rector of Hadlingden, near Liverpool, who is also a magistrate, committed suicide by cutting his throat. The reverend gentleman had read prayers in the morning, and afterwards christened or baptised several children, and at half-past two o'clock in the afternoon he was found dead in his bed, with his throat cut in a shocking manner. A razor was found in his hand. No reason can be assigned for the rash act. Deceased was about sixty years of age.

MORE FORGED RAILWAY SCRIP.—The Committee of the Stockbrokers' Exchange, Manchester, have this week been engaged in investigating a curious case of forged scrip. It appears that, a month or two ago, some spurious scrip shares in the Yorkshire, Doncaster, and Goole Railway, one of the lines of 1847, were circulated at Manchester, and that, although every inquiry had been instituted, still no clue to the party forging them could be obtained. Some light, however, has been thrown on the transaction by the recovery of a receipt for the spurious scrip; but unfortunately, from the receipt being in London, the whereabouts of the party cannot be ascertained. The present is not, it is supposed, the only case in which parties have been cheated. The party forging them is supposed to have adopted a very dexterous law of procedure. He would bargain for the genuine scrip for immediate delivery, and on completing a base imitation of the true, would return to the seller with the fabricated scrip, and throw it again in his hands, saying he had changed his mind, and must be compelled to tender them back again. In this way, by means of getting some of the scrip paper, either from the Company's office or the printer's, he is supposed to have succeeded in imposing on his victims. The Committee at Manchester have, it is understood, decided that the broker who negotiated the purchase must make good the scrip.

PRIVATIONS OF BONNET MAKERS.—On Monday evening a long inquiry took place before Mr. Carter, at the Feathers Tavern, Walworth, as to the death of Ann Gallagher, aged sixty-five. The unfortunate deceased, it was in evidence from what was witnessed in her room, was in an extreme state of destitution. There was but a single chair, and a mass of mere rags for a bed. Mrs. Young, of 10, Burton-street, stated that the deceased lived in her house, where she had a single room. She was a strong bonnet maker.—Coroner: And what could she earn at that? Witness: Sixpence a day in full work, but she could not work lately.—Coroner: Was that all she had to live on?—Witness: I believe she had 2s. 6d. a week from the parish. The witness went on to state that she often gave her tea and other things, but she would never let her go into the room. On the previous Saturday she sent for some laudanum, and took a portion of it. She said it would assuage her pain. On Wednesday she was found dead in bed. Coroner: Do you think she took the laudanum for the purpose of destroying life? —Witness said she thought she had been in such a state of want, and as she herself said her stomach was destroyed from want of food, that the laudanum had had a great effect on her. On the Wednesday when she saw her she thought deceased was stupified from the effects of the laudanum. The Foreman and other of two of the Jury said they had no doubt the laudanum had accelerated her death from extreme weakness arising from want; but ultimately a verdict of "Natural Death" was returned, the Coroner observing that if laudanum had accelerated death it was not taken intentionally.

LAMENTABLE ACCIDENT FROM FIRE ARMS.—A melancholy instance, occasioned by the dangerous habit of playing with fire-arms, occurred last week at Dublin. In consequence of a recent attempt to break into the house, Mr. P loaded a brace of pistols in case of further attack, during the day, putting them in what "Natural Death" was returned, the Coroner observing that if laudanum had accelerated death it was not taken intentionally.

LAMENTABLE ACCIDENT FROM FIRE ARMS.—A melancholy instance, occasioned by the dangerous habit of playing with fire-arms, occurred last week at Dublin. In consequence of a recent attempt to break into the house, Mr. P loaded a brace of pistols in case of further attack, during the day, putting them in what he deemed an "out-of-the-way place." His youngest boy, aged seven years, unfortunately saw his father deposit them, and in his absence placed some books on a chair, and proceeded in getting one, when, going to the top of the room, he found, called to his sister, who was ascending, "Mind your eye, or I'll shoot you"—little imagining the weapon to be loaded, or that the words spoken in play were to be so horribly verified. He pulled the trigger, and the ball passed through his sister's heart.

THE HIGHWAY ROBBERY AND SUSPECTED MURDER IN WESTMINSTER.—On Tuesday, before the Coroner, held an inquest at the Grosvenor Arms, Kensington-place, Westminster, on the body of Mr. John Bellchambers, aged 57, an engineer, lately residing at No. 44, Willcox-street, Vincent-square, which, it will be recollected, was robbed and most brutally ill-used by a gang of thieves on the morning of the 11th inst. An account of the outrage was given in our Police report.—Mr. F. H. Holt, surgeon, 30, Abingdon-street, Westminster, stated that he knew deceased well, and saw him on the three days prior to the present occurrence, and he was then in excellent health. Witness was called to attend him at six o'clock in the morning of Monday week, and found him quite insensible from a wound on the right temple of about an inch and a quarter in length, a graze on the right cheek, with a small cut under the left eye; both eyes were blackened above the orbits. From all appearances, he thought there was a fracture of the brain. By the Coroner: Was inclined to think that the wound on the forehead was the effect of some deadly weapon. Saw deceased three times a day from this period till his death. He continued sensible and sensible on Sunday evening.—By the Coroner: Considered the wounds were the result of more than one blow. Inspector Taylor, of the B division, in answer to the Coroner, said that George McKay and Thomas Doyle were in custody on remand, as being connected in the affair. The Coroner then observed that the case still being in the hands of the police, he thought that some mischief might be done by proceeding with it any further at present in that (the Coroner's) court, and especially as all the parties suspected were not yet apprehended. The inquest was then adjourned for a fortnight.

ATTEMPT TO ROB AND MURDER A YOUNG LADY.—A man named James Venn, a returned convict, who, on Monday evening, delivered himself up to a police-constable of the Bedminster division of police, as being the perpetrator of a daring highway robbery, accompanied by an attempt to murder, on the person of a respectable young woman, named Ann Lossemore, was examined at Bristol on Tuesday. The prosecutrix, who appeared to be still suffering from the injuries inflicted upon her, at once identified the prisoner as the man who had robbed and maltreated her. She stated that between five and six o'clock on the evening of the 11th inst., she had occasion to cross the lanes from Knowle to Bedminster, and as she did so she observed the prisoner following her. On arriving at a point of the road where it is separated by a small rivulet, the prisoner, who had taken the opposite side from her, suddenly sprang upon her, and, with a large stick he was carrying, struck her a blow across the temple, which felled her to the ground. As soon as she came to herself, she found him standing over her, and demanding her money. She told him she had none with her, and begged him to spare her life, but he struck her another violent blow, and let her know that she should spare her life or not. She begged that he would permit her to get up, which he did, and she then gave him eighteenpence—all the money she had with her. He said he must have more, and, upon her assuring him that she had given him all she had with her, he struck her again on the head, and she fell stupified to the earth. Upon partially recovering, she felt that she was wounded, and that the blood was flowing down her face. She felt that the prisoner pull away her pocket, and thrust his hands into and search her bosom, but she was too much terrified, and, indeed, too weak, to raise her head from the ground. Having possessed himself of Miss Lossemore's purse, and threatening her if she should follow him, and telling her that he had a companion keeping watch hard by. As soon as she had recovered a little, Miss Lossemore contrived to reach a house at some little distance near, the persons of which, on seeing her in a fainting state, sent her to the Bristol General Hospital for medical assistance. The prisoner afterwards gave himself up to a constable, stating that he had committed the robbery that he gave her the second blow to quiet the prosecutrix, and that he wanted to be tucked up. The magistrates committed him for trial.

SUICIDE OF A MAN OF COLOUR.—On Wednesday, a man of colour destroyed himself under the following singular circumstances:—The name of the deceased was William Douglas, by trade a cooper, residing with his wife at 17, Clements-lane, Strand. On Tuesday night he went to bed about eight o'clock, apparently quite well in health; but, about four o'clock, his wife was awoke by the sound of the fall of a heavy substance in the apartment; and, upon getting out of bed, she discovered her husband upon the floor, bleeding profusely from the head, and quite insensible. Supposing that he had injured himself whilst in a fit, assistance was obtained, and he was conveyed to King's College Hospital, where he expired shortly after reaching it. Mr. Baker, the Beadle of St. Clement Danes, upon hearing the above particulars, about eight o'clock the same morning, went to the house of the deceased, and, upon looking around the apartment, discovered beneath the bed a pistol, and in the corner of the room a bullet; and a subsequent examination of the body of the unfortunate man showed that his death had been caused by a pistol-shot. In the after part of the day it was ascertained that the deceased had obtained the pistol loaded at Mr. Baker's shop in Great Wild-street, in exchange for an old sword. Neither the wife of deceased, nor any one in the house, heard the report of the pistol.

A WOMAN MURDERED AT GRAVESEND.—A man named William Wilson, a collector of marine stores, residing in New-court, West-street, Gravesend, was apprehended on Wednesday afternoon, on a charge of murdering his wife. It appeared that he came home partly intoxicated, shortly after twelve at noon, and some words taking place between him and the unhappy woman, he struck her violently on the head with a stick. A crowd immediately collected about the place, and Wilson was taken into custody; but all efforts to restore animation in the poor woman who was found lying senseless on the floor were in vain. A Coroner's inquest was held on Thursday, the result of which was a verdict that "the deceased died from apoplexy, but how, or by what means the same was produced, there is not sufficient evidence before the Jury to prove." The inquiry leaves the Magistrates into the charges against the husband of the deceased was adjourned.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR THOMAS PIGOTT, BART., OF KNAPTON, QUEEN'S COUNTY.

THIS gentleman, whose decease we announced last week, was eldest son of the late Sir Thomas Pigott, of Knapton, on whom the title of Baronet was conferred in 1808, and grandson, maternally, of the Right Hon. Thomas Kelly, one of the Judges of the Common Pleas in Ireland. The family from which he derived, a scion of the Pigotts of Dysart, claimed descent from Picot, Baron de Boorne, in Normandy, one of the forty knights who accompanied William the Conqueror.

Sir Thomas, born 12th October, 1796, served early in life in the Horse Guards, in which distinguished regiment he attained the rank of Captain. He married, 24th Oct., 1831, Georgiana-Anne, daughter of William Brummel, Esq., of Wivenhoe, Essex, and has left issue. His decease occurred at Dullingham House, near Newmarket, the seat of his brother, William Pigott, Esq.

COLONEL CHARLES SOMERVILLE MACALESTER, CHIEF OF THE CLAN ALESTER.

DIED at Kennox, Ayrshire, on the 7th instant, Colonel Charles Somerville Macalester, aged eighty-two.

This gentleman was Chief of the Macalesters of Loupe, in Kintire, Argyleshire, a family of high and ancient lineage, being descended in the male line from Alexander, third Lord of the Isles of Scotland, and Earl of Ross, great grandson of Somerled, Thane of Argyle in 1140, and who was slain in battle with Malcolm, the fourth King of Scotland, in the year 1164, as was recently established at the Lord Lyon Office, in Edinburgh, and authority given to the deceased gentleman to bear the arms and supporters of the ancient family of Loupe, as Chieftain of that Clan.

The possessions of this family in the Isles, and, subsequently, in Kintire, were very extensive; and the former were forfeited in the 15th century by rebellions against their Sovereign, and the latter greatly diminished by clannish warfare, and unlimited devotion to the fortunes of the House of Stuart.

Charles, the deceased Chieftain, married, in 1792, Janet, daughter and heiress of William Somerville, of Kennox, in Ayrshire; and in terms of entail of that property, took the name and bore the arms of that family in addition to his own; by this lady he had three daughters and two sons, the eldest of whom, Charles Somerville Macalester, succeeds to his honours and estates.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL JOHN MACKAY, 42ND REGIMENT.

THIS distinguished officer died on the 9th July last, at the age of sixty-two years, of an attack of dysentery, at London, Upper Canada, where his regiment was stationed. Colonel Mackay, who was the only son of the late Rev. John Mackay, Rector of Loughgiel, in the county of Antrim, entered the army in the year 1804, at the early age of eighteen, as Ensign in the 42nd Regiment, and had, therefore, served upwards of 42 years. He took part in nearly the entire of the Peninsular War; was present at the siege and capture of Ciudad Rodrigo, Talavera, &c.; was twice wounded at Barossa, and was specially complimented by General Grahame, for his gallant conduct upon that occasion. He fought, also, at the battle of Corunna, where General Sir John Moore fell; and, at the siege of Copenhagen, he volunteered, and led the forlorn hope, which, at his special request, was entirely composed of Irishmen. He accompanied his Regiment to America in the last war, and was present at the battles of Quebec, Niagara, Montreal, &c.; subsequently, after remaining thirteen years in the Mauritius, and seven years in Jamaica, he was on duty, for the second time, in North America, where he fell a victim to the pestilence and disease with which that country has been unfortunately visited this last summer. Though a rigid disciplinarian, Colonel Mackay was greatly beloved by his officers and men. His family, which was a branch of the ancient and noble family of Mackay, Lords of Reay, in Scotland, settled at an early period in Lisburn, in the county of Antrim. His grandfather, Joseph Mackay, Esq., was a magistrate of the county for upwards of forty years; and removed to Lisburn from the town of Antrim, where he possessed considerable property.

Colonel Mackay died unmarried; and his property is inherited by the children of his only sister, who was married to Doctor O'Neall, of Comber, county of Down.

CAPTAIN WILLIAM NUGENT GLASCOCK, R.N.

THIS distinguished writer, whose nautical novels and frequent contributions to periodical literature have so long delighted the public, died in Ireland a short time since. He had quitted Dublin apparently in perfect health and spirits, to pay a visit to his relations at Ballynrown, near Baltinglass, but on stepping from the stage coach into a friend's carriage, he was seized with apoplexy, and died almost immediately.

The gallant officer, whose profession was that of the Royal Navy, learnt his duties in 1808, stood high in the estimation of his profession, and the Admiralty. In 1801, he fought in the Vengeance at Copenhagen; was Mate of the Barfleur in Sir Robert Calder's action, and was also present at the bombardment of Algiers, in the Wellesley expedition, served, while Lieutenant of the Desirade for his firm and prudent conduct in command of a squadron of small vessels in the Douro, during the struggle between Dons Pedro and Miguel. A few days before his death, Captain Glascock had left Newry on retiring from the office of Inspector under the Poor Relief Act; and the fact of his having been presented with twenty-two public addresses from his District Committees, proves he was eminently calculated to command and to excite the co-operation of those who served with him. He leaves a widow and family.

THE VENERABLE WILLIAM DEALTRY, D.D., ARCHDEACON OF SURREY.

DR DEALTRY, a sound Churchman, a classical scholar, and an eloquent Divine, has died, deeply and sincerely lamented. The melancholy event occurred at Brighton, on the 16th instant. He received his education at the University of Cambridge, where he graduated in 1796, as Second Wrangler. Here he afterwards obtained a Fellowship at Trinity College. The important Rectory of Clapham he held for thirty years, and to the ministerial duties of that large parish he was incessant in his devotion. On the preferment of Dr. Wilberforce to the see of Oxford, Dr. Dealtry was appointed to the Archdeaconry of Surrey; and, in a visitation charge delivered almost immediately after by the newly-consecrated Diocesan, his Lordship spoke in the highest terms of the Archdeacon, alluding to him "as one of the most practical men in the Church, an accomplished scholar, a sound Divine, a generous friend, and one deeply imbued with that holy faith of which he was the the eloquent expounder." By his death, the Rectory of Clapham, as well as the Archdeaconry of Surrey, become vacant. The latter is in the gift of the Bishop of Winchester.

THE REV. DR. FORBES.

THE decease of this learned and able Professor, who for thirty years filled the Chair of Humanity in King's College, Aberdeen, took place on the 13th instant.

DR. FORBES was not only a good scholar in the common acceptation of the word, but had devoted a great deal of time to scientific pursuits, in which his excellence was so marked, that the Senatus unanimously appointed him to lecture on Chemistry. "In this department," says a Northern Contemporary, "and, indeed, in everything connected with the progress of the human mind, the departed gentleman displayed great ingenuity and thorough independence of thought." At one time, Dr. Forbes performed the duties of minister of Boharm, but he was afterwards removed to Old Aberdeen.

THE REV. WILLIAM HODGSON, D.D., MASTER OF ST. PETER'S, CAMBRIDGE.

DR. HODGSON, the thirty-seventh Master of St. Peter's, since the foundation of the College, died on the 16th instant, at his official residence, in Trumpington-street, Cambridge. At the period of his decease, he was in the forty-seventh year of his age, and the tenth of his mastership. His entrance at the University bears date in 1819, and his Bachelor's degree in 1823—a year known as "Airey's year," from the fact of the Astronomer Royal having been Senior Wrangler on that occasion. Mr. Hodgson held the place of Eleventh Wrangler. In 1826, he proceeded to his Master's degree; in 1833, was created B.D.; and, in 1838, obtained the Presidency of St. Peter's, at the death of the Venerable Dr. Barnes; and, very shortly after, he became D.D.

Few members of the learned community of which he formed part were more universally beloved and respected. For some time past, he had been in a declining state of health, but no immediate danger was apprehended until shortly before the fatal termination of his illness. The College Chapel will be hung with black, and all outward testimonies of respect to the deceased Principal will be observed by the authorities.

Dr. Hodgson married, in 1838, Charlotte, daughter of General Tarleton, of Chester, and leaves issue, two sons and one daughter.

THE ARCHDUKE FREDERICK OF AUSTRIA.

THE Archduke Frederick Ferdinand Leopold of Austria was fourth son of the late eminent Field-Marshal, the Archduke Charles, uncle of the present Emperor. The Archduke Frederick was born on the 14th May, 1821; and, besides being a military officer, served in the Austrian navy. In 1844 he succeeded, as Commander-in-Chief of the Marine Forces of Austria in the Adriatic, to the late Admiral Bandiera, the father of the unfortunate young men who were shot in Calabria. The Archduke Frederick died on the 5th instant, at Venice, of fever, or, as it is believed by many, of cholera. His Imperial Highness was unmarried.

COUNT BJORNSTJERNA.

HIS Excellency Count Magnus Bjornstjerna, Ambassador from Sweden at the Court of St. James's, General Inspector of Artillery, and Knight of various Orders, died recently at Stockholm. This distinguished soldier and able diplomatist was son of the late Count Bjornstjerna, Swedish Ambassador at the Diet of Regensburg, by his wife, Wilhelmina Van Hager, a German lady. He was born 10th Oct. 1779, and early entered the military service of his country. In 1808, he fought with distinction in the campaign against Russia; and in 1813, went to Germany and with his regiment occupied Vierlander. He served likewise in the battles of Dennewetz and Leipsic; and concluded the Lubeck capitulation with Lallemand, and the armistice with the Prince of Hesse.

Count Bjornstjerna was known as a writer on politics, and national economy, and published several works on the East Indies.

MR. ROOKE.

THIS eminent musician and composer, who died on the 4th instant, was a native of Ireland, and was deservedly esteemed and admired in his profession. Many popular vocal pieces were of his composition. His two operas, "Henrique" and "Amelie," especially the latter, had signal success. As a teacher of music Mr. Rooke counted among his pupils Balfe, Hughes (the leader of Drury-Lane), the tenor Harrison, and Miss Forde (a well-known clever actress and singer). Mr. Rooke's death occurred at his residence, at Walham Green, after several months of intense suffering. He was in his 55th year, and he leaves a widow and numerous family to lament his loss.

 We have received a letter from Mr. West Awdry, stating that the succession to the patrimonial estate was incorrectly given in our last number. The Memoir was received from a Correspondent; and is, we believe, in other respects, correct.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IMPROVEMENT OF LIVERPOOL.—At the dinner given by the Mayor of Liverpool to Sir R. Peel and a distinguished party, yesterday week, Lord Sandon gave the following interesting statistics, illustrating the increase of the importance and commerce of the town since he was first returned as a member, in 1831. The population in 1831 was 205,964; in 1846 it had nearly doubled, being 348,625. The revenue produced by the Corporation dues was £40,363; in 1847, it is £59,385. The town dues were, in 1831, £49,532; in 1847 they were nearly double, the amount being £97,219. The dock revenue, in 1831, was £183,455; and, although the rates were reduced in 1836, they produced this year £244,416. In 1831 there were 111 acres of water space in the docks; there are now 160 acres, with 14 miles of lineal quay space. The shipping of the port was, in 1831, 1,800,000 vessels; it is now 20,893 vessels. The tonnage of the port was, in 1831, 1,592,436 tons, and in 1847, 3,351,839. The cotton imported was, in 1831, 729,463 bales, and in 1845, 1,134,081 bales. In 1831, the railway system was in its infancy, the Liverpool and Manchester line having been one of the most successful. In 1844, the United Kingdom had expended on 2668 miles a capital of £62,411,258. Parliament sanctioned, in 1845 and 1846, 7634 miles additional, which would cost £160,844,000; and in 1847, 2244 miles, to cost £34,692,800. The total railway capital will thus be £287,448,398.

THE IPSWICH AND NORWICH RAILWAY.—The works have been resumed on the heaviest part of the line, and those for the rest from Norwich. From Haughley towards Norwich, five miles of the line are nearly completed, and will be shortly opened. The line to Norwich is more than half completed, and the progress has been equal to that of any other line of equal length in the country.

THE CHESTER AND HOLYHEAD RAILWAY.—The portion of this railway which is completed, namely, from Chester to Conway (about forty-five miles), will be formally opened on the 1st December next. The line which the Directors and officials recently took over the line was considered highly satisfactory. The works are substantially constructed, and the permanent way well consolidated. Much difficulty was felt by the excavators in passing through the tunnels under the great mountains Penmaen Bach and Penmaen Mawr. Between these two mountains the railway runs for a portion of its length upon a sea wall, which has been so constructed as thoroughly to resist the action of the swell from the Channel.

DEPRESSION OF TRADE AT BIRMINGHAM.—The general trade of the town of Birmingham is becoming decidedly worse. In consequence of the onslaught upon railway enterprise, many of the companies throughout the country have resolved upon suspending operations, and consequently orders they had given for carriages and other articles, in the manufacturing of which would have been a source of useful employment to thousands of industrious mechanics, who, with the artisans of Lancashire, will soon be doomed to idleness and penury. Last week, the proprietor of one of the largest carriage manufactories in this district, if not in England, called together a large portion of his hands, and informed them that, in consequence of the monetary affairs of the country, several railway companies had withdrawn orders which they had given, and suspended others for the present; and it was with deep regret he felt compelled to discharge them, as he could not employ them as he had formerly done, and it is many of his hands. Notice to leave was given to seventy men, and it is understood that many more will receive notice. Seven hundred persons are employed in the works.

STATE OF TRADE AT OLDHAM.—The cotton trade in this town and neighbourhood is exceedingly depressed, and every day the prospect becomes more and more gloomy. Several large manufacturing establishments have entirely ceased working, and hundreds of operatives are thrown out of employment, and are at present without means of subsistence. The majority of the cotton-mills throughout the parish are working short time. The great machine-making firm of Messrs. Platt, Platt, and Sons, have discharged nearly all their workpeople until better times!

NEW CHURCH AT WESTON-SUPER-MARE.—A very handsome new parish church, consisting of a nave, chancel, and side aisles of five bays, surmounted by a noble looking tower at the western entrance, in the perpendicular style of Gothic architecture, was consecrated on the 15th inst., by the Lord Bishop of Bath and Wells, at the above-mentioned picturesque and fashionable watering-place.

EXTRAORDINARY VEGETATION NEAR LIVERPOOL.—The present mild weather has brought forth fresh buds on almost all the fruit trees in the neighbourhood of Liverpool; but what is more extraordinary still, there is at present an old pear-tree in the garden of Mr Beaty, Oxton, which is in full blossom.

ADJOURNED BURGLARY NEAR NEWARK.—The Mumby four men of notorious character were brought to Nottingham county gaol, charged with having committed a burglary of a daring and extraordinary nature. On Thursday morning last week at a quarter before one o'clock, five men, with blackened faces, smock-frocks, and otherwise disguised, broke open the house of Mr. Richard Atkinson, victualler, at Grassthorpe, seven miles from Newark, by removing a pane of glass from the parlour window, and having proceeded up stairs to the chamber where the landlord and his wife were in bed. Finding the door locked, they smashed the panels and the lock, and forcing their way in, surrounded the bed, holding up their lights, and brandishing a plough-coulter, and threatened to murder both the man and his wife if they did not lie still, or made any resistance. The villains swore repeatedly that the old couple should tell them where their money was before they went to sewing men, and it is understood that many more will receive notice. Seven hundred persons are employed in the works.

MALTA.—THE PORT OF VALETTA, FROM THE FRONT OF THE LAZARETTO.

MAJOR-GENERAL WILLIAM J. WORTH.

(From our New York Correspondent.)

Of all those men of striking talents now attached as officers to the army of the United States, and engaged in the prosecution of the war against Mexico, not one has acquired greater distinction, manifested nobler zeal, or acted with more determination, than the gallant Worth, second in rank in that division of the United States army under the immediate command of General Scott.

Preferring the chances of war, and the active life of a soldier, to the speculations of trade, and the sedentary life of a merchant, he soon withdrew from that avocation, to which his military ardour had, in early life, formed insurmountable objections, and, during the war of 1812, enlisted as a private in the regular army.

He was appointed First Lieutenant of the 33rd regiment of Infantry, on the 19th of March of the same year; and, on the 19th of August, 1814, just forty-five days after the battle of Chippewa, in which he rendered important service, he received a commission as Captain.

MAJOR-GENERAL WORTH.

Lieutenant Worth acted as aide to General Scott in the battle of Lundy's Lane, July, 25, 1814, and by his skill, and the precision of every military movement, merited the approbation of the commanding General.

After this battle, in which he was severely wounded, he was, through the influence of General Scott, promoted to the rank of Major, and, on the 25th July, 1824, to that of Lieutenant-Colonel by brevet.

A Major of Ordnance in 1832, he received, on the 7th July, 1838, the appointment of Colonel in the 8th regiment of Infantry.

In the spring of the year, 1841, he was ordered to Florida, where he remained until the close of the war.

On one occasion during this campaign, an inquiry was addressed to General Worth, concerning the place in which he could be found if attacked by the Indians; to which the General returned the characteristic reply, "In the saddle, sir."

In the month of March, 1849, he was made Brigadier-General by brevet; and at the termination of the Florida war, he was entrusted with the general management of the United States Military Academy, at West Point, under the title of Superintendent. For a very considerable time he held this responsible situation; creditably, and ably, performing every duty.

Enjoying the confidence of his countrymen, and of the Administration, he was ordered to Mexico, soon after the commencement of the war against that Republic.

The first battle in which he was engaged thereafter, was that of Monterey, September 20, 1846; which resulted in the surrender of the city after a siege of four days. Generals Worth and Henderson, and Colonel Davis, acted on this occasion as Commissioners on the part of General Taylor, to agree upon the terms of the capitulation.

On the 25th of November, General Worth was ordered, with a detachment of regular troops, to make preparations to march from Saltillo, by the month of January, 1847, towards Vera Cruz, in order to join the expedition of General Scott against that city.

After the surrender, he received the appointment of Governor of Vera Cruz; and, as the administrator of civil affairs, governed with great ability and knowledge. This station was held by him until after the battle of Cerro Gordo, and until relieved by the appointment of Colonel Wilson.

A Major-General by brevet, March 3, 1847, he fought valiantly in the battles of Contreras and Chunubusco, and exhibited the greatest personal bravery.

MALTA—VALETTA.

Recent events in Malta have given an unusual interest to this fine island. Its central position, excellent port, and great strength, make it an admirable naval station. The harbour of Valetta, the capital, is perhaps, one of the finest, and certainly one of the safest, in the world.

A Correspondent has sketched the accompanying view of the town from the front of the lazaretto. To the left is seen the narrow mouth of the Quarantine Harbour, with its defences; a Turkish polacca brig has just come in; the yellow flag flies from the main, and near her a guardian boat is stationed.

Above the bastion on the right, is the monument to Sir Frederick Ponsonby, a late Governor of Malta. On the top of the hill are seen the cupola of St. John's Church, and the Government House, on the latter of which a standard is hoisted. Immediately in front is the Church, built by the Dowager Queen Adelaide; below which are some of the curious and rude dwellings of the lazzaroni, excavated in the rock. On the left are the Artillery Barracks. The general appearance of the town is very striking. The flat roofs of the houses, and the absence of glass in the windows, give an almost ruinous character to the place, and add little to the cheerfulness of travellers, to whom, for many days, this is the most prominent view.

The harbour, according to the Morning Post Correspondent, "presents an animated appearance, from the presence of a considerable British naval force, the liberal expenditure of the officers and crews of which gives a briskness to trade. The Hibernia, 104 (flag-ship), with the Trafalgar, 120; Rodney, 92; Albion, 90; Vanguard, 80; and Superb, 80, ships of the line, are so moored as to form an impregnable floating battery, commanding the wide entrance of the harbour; whilst the Ceylon, receiving-ship, bearing the flag of the second in command, the hospitable Sir Lucius Curtis, Superintendent of Malta Dockyard, with the Thetis, 36; Gladiator and Heela, war steamers; Wee Pet, steam-tug; Ardent and Flamer, steam-packets; the Peninsular and Oriental Company's steam-packet Ariel, and the cutter yacht Louisa, with a host of smaller local pleasure yachts, yclept (par excellence) the Mosquito Squadron, distributed in the several creeks, complete the tableau, and give the French, whose steamers continually hover about the coast, a pretty correct idea of the naval resources of the Mistress of the Sea.

"On the afternoon of the 13th of October, the Caire (French steam-packet) entered the quarantine harbour, with the Egyptian standard flying; and soon after coming to an anchor it was ascertained to have been hoisted in honour of his Highness Ibrahim Pacha, who, owing to ill-health, had, by his medical advisers, Dr. Franc, been ordered a sea-voyage; and so alarming did his case appear, that although he only reached Alexandria on the 7th at noon, weak and fatigued as he was, he embarked on board the Caire on the 9th, and left on the 10th. This sudden departure of his Highness, on the very day of an annular eclipse of the sun, a phenomenon always looked upon with awe by the astrologers of Egypt, added to the unusual high rise of the Nile on the two days preceding, had given rise to innumerable predictions and forebodings, some of which are of a very gloomy character."

According to the Times' Correspondent, Ibrahim Pacha was en route to England; and was to proceed on the 14th, viâ Marseilles.

Colonial Postage.—A Treasury warrant was published in the Gazette of Tuesday night, directing that on all letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight, transmitted by packet boat between the islands of Martinique and Guadaloupe respectively, and also between those islands and British North America and the British West Indies, there shall be one uniform rate of postage of fourpence. It also orders that on all letters of the same weight transmitted from any town to another in the island of Hong Kong, there shall be a postage of one penny. It also directs that for the future the letters by any of her Majesty's Mediterranean packet boats via Southampton, between the United Kingdom and the East Indies, the Indian Ocean, Ceylon, the Mauritius, China, the Chinese Seas, the Phillippines, the Moluccas, Australia, New Zealand, or any other countries, via Syria or Egypt, shall for the future be chargeable with any additional postage to the Red Sea or the Persian Gulf. Also that on every foreign newspaper conveyed by the post between Gibraltar or any other British colony in the Mediterranean, and the island of Hong Kong, or any other British colony in the East Indies, there shall be a uniform rate of postage of one penny, in addition to the charge for forwarding it by land through Egypt. On all newspapers transmitted in the same manner to ports in China, or to the Phillippine Islands, the charge is to be twopence. The order also directs that on all printed pamphlets or publications printed in the United Kingdom, and transmitted thence by post between any places within British North America, or within the British West Indies, there shall be, in lieu of all other rates, a colonial rate of one penny for every ounce weight, but that no such publication shall be forwarded by post if weighing more than 10 ounces. The minute then proceeds to extend the privilege now granted to persons in the East India service of receiving letters not exceeding half an ounce in weight at the rate of a penny, to persons in her Majesty's service in the island of Hong Kong, or other places in the Chinese or Indian Seas.

CARDINAL FERRETTI.

Cardinal Gabriel Ferretti is the chief Secretary of State of the Papal Government; he is the first Minister of Pius IX., who has found in him an able and determined seconder in his plans of reform. The Pope was for some time thwarted by the Ministers he was obliged to keep in their respective posts; but the discovery of the plot of the Austrian Government, to excite an insurrection in Rome, produced a state of feeling that enabled him to replace them by others more imbued with his liberal political opinions. Cardinal Ferretti has gained great popularity by his bold language in the face of the threats of Austria. A few days since he inspected the troops in the Castle of St. Angelo; the soldiers having been formed in square the Cardinal advanced to the centre, and addressed them in a speech, which, in the circumstances under which it was spoken, must have produced a great effect. Having expressed to them the satisfaction of the Pope at their conduct and appearance, he said, "I exhort you to a strict observance of your duties and disciplins; not that I have any special reasons for so doing, for, thanks to God, our land is quiet and peaceable, more so, perhaps, than any other. However, should any danger arise, I am certain that, grateful to your Sovereign, who is also your father, you will give him proofs of your fidelity and courage; and you would not be alone; I would be your companion! Though clothed with the priestly habit, I may not exercise the courage of the soldier, yet, believe me, I possess enough of the courage of the citizen not to be behind when the occasion calls us. But I repeat, the peril will not occur! Soldiers! I exhort you to three things—Religion fidelity, discipline!"

The address was received with acclamations and cheers by the troops and loud cries of "Vive Pius IX."

The Population of Brussels.—From a return lately sent in to the Communal Council of Brussels, it appears that on October 1, 1847, there were in that city 137,745 inhabitants, or 4241 more than at the corresponding period of 1846. There were born in 1846, 2480 male children, and 2399 female ones, being 161 births less than 1845. The number of deaths in 1846 was 2463 for males, and 2253 for females, being 188 more than in 1845. The receipts of the city amounted in 1846 to 5,400,395 francs 85 cents, and the expenditure to 5,521,406 francs 80 cents.

THE HUSKISSON STATUE.

During the recent visit of Sir Robert Peel to Liverpool, the statue of Mr. Huskisson, placed upon its pedestal, was unveiled to the ex-Premier; and has since attracted a great number of spectators. We gather from the Liverpool Albion, that the statue, of light bronze, was cast in Holland, from a statue executed in Rome, by Gibson, and is a present from Mrs. Huskisson to the town on which the deeply lamented deceased reflected so much lustre, as its representative. It is eight feet four inches in height, and, although not of solid metal, weighs eighteen hundredweight. From the smallness of its pedestal, the statue at first sight appears very unprotected, but this only serves to add to its effect; and, viewed from South Castle-street, it is both a striking and a pleasing object. The position is dignified and imposing, and the drapery is arranged with grace and freedom. A plain substantial cast-iron palisade, from the foundry of Messrs. P. E. Weber and Co., was, on Friday (the morning of elevation), fixed on the outer edge of the raised freestone basement, and encloses an area of about twelve feet square. The pedestal is of granite, and bears, in plain bronze letters, the simple, but sufficient, inscription, "William Huskisson." He holds a document, rolled up, in the right hand, which rests upon the thigh. The head considerably reclines, and the figure appears looking down upon the spectators.

At the grand dinner given to Sir Robert Peel, at Liverpool, on Friday last, the Mayor, in proposing "The Health of Sir Robert Peel," observed that the toast had peculiar interest, not only because of the prominent position of Sir R. Peel, but because he had that day kindly consented to be present on raising the Statue of one of the most distinguished of his colleagues in a former Administration to the pedestal prepared for it in front of the Custom House. It was, (the Mayor said,) exceedingly appropriate that Sir R. Peel should have arrived in Liverpool on that particular day, for the town was then being engaged in doing honour to one to whom it owed much; and it was the peculiar glory and pride of Sir Robert Peel to have followed out, consummated, and completed, the policy which Mr. Huskisson had so advantageously originated. (Loud cheers.)

PALACE OF THE PRINCE OF CANINO, AT ROME.

The arrest of the Prince of Canino, on the 23rd ult., was briefly chronicled in our Journal of the 9th instant. The details are as follow:—Cardinal Ferretti joins to great devotedness to Pius IX. much frankness and straightforwardness, and an energy absolutely necessary at present for the direction of affairs. He has just given a proof of this in ordering Prince Canino, Charles Bonaparte, to consider himself under arrest at his own residence. This order was executed by the National Guard, of which the Prince forms part, and at the demand of the Governor of Rome. The political eccentricities of the Prince at Leghorn, Pisa, and Venice, were not lost sight of. On his arrival at Rome, he was received neither by the Secretary of State, nor by the Pope. It appears, according to the most accredited version, that the Prince, being in the Pope's ante-chamber, perceived a copy of the decree of the Governor of Rome and Cardinal Ferretti, alluded to above, blaming his manifestation in honour of the Ministers of Sardinia and Tuscany; after having run his eye through the document, he pulled out his pencil, and added in the margin certain commentaries and observations of an improper character; it was after this conduct, following what he had done for the fortnight or three weeks before, that the Government ordered his arrest. The Prince, it is said, intimated that he would obey, but said that he intended going the same evening as usual to the theatre; to this it was replied, that if he passed the threshold of his palace, the National Guard should receive orders to take him to the prison of St. Angelo. Every one applauds this conduct of the Government, showing, as it does, that it knows how to punish a wealthy Prince as well as a simple individual, in case he transgresses the rule of duty.

We learn from Rome, under date of the 5th, that the Prince of Canino was still under arrest in his palace. It is reported that he had written a letter to the Pope, which was sent back unopened, his Holiness having declined entering into any correspondence with him.

Our Correspondent's Sketch shows part of the principal façade of the Prince's Palace at Rome, with the National Guards on duty.

Of the organisation of this new force, a Correspondent of the Times gives the following particulars:—

The National Guards are admirable for their zeal, good order, and discipline. It is not, as in France, a heavy tax levied on labour. The idle bear the whole burden. The position of each is taken into consideration. Tans, barbers never mount guard on Saturdays or Sundays. The operatives only perform duty on Sundays and holidays. Physicians may at all hours quit their post. Shopkeepers and others are allowed to attend to their business, and should any person be obliged from necessity to absent himself, the chief of the post never fails to give him leave, provided he promises to return at a certain hour. The rich, who have nothing to do, enjoy none of those privileges; they are always under arms, and constitute nearly alone the active portion of the militia. Every day they are drilled and exercised. I have seen battalions execute platoon fires with as much precision as our best troops. The Pope, in instituting the National Guard, evidently wished to remedy the disorder and demoralizing idleness of the upper classes.

MR. GIBSON, THE SCULPTOR.

GIBSON, THE SCULPTOR.

The fame of the artist of the noble memorial of Huskisson, engraved in the adjoining column, is claimed by the journalists of Liverpool as peculiarly belonging to that town, where he first manifested a taste for the sculptor's art. At the banquet lately given to Sir Robert Peel, Mr. Gibson's health was proposed by the Mayor, and drunk with cordiality; and the sculptor's reply is characterised by the modesty of genius. In thanking the company, Mr. Gibson said—"I hope my vanity will not be increased by the encomiums which the Mayor has been pleased to pass upon my works, but I trust that his praises and your approbation will stimulate me to accomplish greater things. I return you my very best thanks for the honour you have done me."

We subjoin, by aid of a Liverpool paper, a few particulars of the sculptor's early life and professional career.

John Gibson was born in 1790, at Gyffyn, near Conway, in North Wales. His father was a gardener, upon the estate of R. Griffiths, Esq., who appears to have taken considerable interest in the early fortunes of Gibson's boyhood; for, by this gentleman's advice, he was sent to Liverpool, to be apprenticed to a cabinet-maker and carver in wood, his masters being Messrs. Southwell and Wilson. Here young Gibson excelled in carving, and the modeling of small wooden figures. The first work which attracted notice in public, was a small figure of Time, modeled in wax, in the year 1808, when the artist was in his eighteenth year. This received the attention of Messrs. T. and S. Francey, sculptors, of Brownlow-hill, Liverpool, who immediately purchased young Gibson's indentures for £70, and employed him in the higher branches of their own business. Whilst with them, he executed (1810) a model of the Seasons, and a figure of Cupid, for John Gladstone, Esq. The Cupid is considered to be one of Gibson's finest productions.

Yours truly
John Gibson

After young Gibson had served the remainder of his term of apprenticeship, to the satisfaction of Messrs. Franceys, he was noticed by the late William Roscoe, Esq., who added to his qualifications as a man of letters, a refined taste for painting and statuary; and, it is worthy of remark, that Roscoe, like Gibson, was born in a humble sphere. By the merchant-author, the young modeler was recommended to the patronage of Michael Angelo Taylor, Esq., then M.P. for the city of Durham, and a munificent patron of the Fine Arts. Gibson was immediately set to work in the execution of a number of models of Mr. Taylor's family. Then followed an introduction to Lord Castlereagh, from whom Gibson received letters of introduction to Canova, the sculptor; and, in 1820, he started for Rome, where he devoted himself to the study of the old masters. It was here that Gibson first met the Duke of Devonshire, whose munificence in encouraging English talent is alike honourable to his Grace's taste and rank; and, from the Duke, Gibson received a commission for the celebrated group of Mars and Venus. The fine execution of this work gained for the young sculptor the patronage of the King of Bavaria, for whom Gibson chiseled several groups. "Since then," says the Liverpool paper, "his fame has become a patent fact, and many of the Italian and English nobility, with some of our own merchant princes, have employed him, and prize his productions. In disposition, Mr. Gibson is mild and unassuming, amiable and humane; and it is a circumstance which may be recorded to his honour that, in his affluence at Rome, he never forgot the duty of sharing his means with his parents, in Liverpool."

PALACE OF THE PRINCE OF CANINO, AT ROME.—THE NATIONAL GUARD.

Of Mr. Gibson's status of Queen Victoria, which now graces the gallery of Buckingham Palace, a fine Engraving appeared in No. 272, (present Volume), of the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

The annexed Portrait of the distinguished Sculptor has already been acknowledged by more than one of those who know him, to be an excellent likeness.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1847.

THE Power that, half a century ago, was considered one of the poorest in Europe, is likely to become, and that at no distant date, the richest. The fact of the Emperor of Russia having five millions sterling, in bullion, to invest in the funds of France and England, at a time when both those wealthy nations were suffering under a pressure, since increased, led people to inquire where that Russia is attaining the enviable position of being the producer of that article which all the rest of the world so much covets—gold. She has not to spin and weave, and with enormous toil, manufacture and export, to bring the precious metal to her; she finds it in her own sands, and that in such quantities, that it begins to excite the attention of the financiers of Europe. Now that gold is so exceedingly scarce on the Exchanges of London and Paris, it is not without a kind of envy men hear of the abundance of that metal in the dominions of the Czar. Should the supply increase—and the tendency is in that direction—It is difficult to fix a limit to the power of Russia. A Ruler completely absolute, with sixty millions of population at his disposal, and unlimited wealth to direct his armies, without the necessity of troubling the race of Rothschild, make a formidable combination, one that will have to be studied by the powers of Western Europe, and that attentively. Should the silver mines of Mexico fall into the hands of the Americans, as there is every probability they will, the quantity of silver raised will be much increased by the greater skill and energy that will certainly be carried into mining operations; we shall then see the bulk of the supply of the precious metals in the hands of the Autocrat of the Old World, and the Republicans of the New. Politically, and historically, they are both new Powers; but they have a vast future before them. The gold mines of Russia are in a chain of the Ural mountains, which runs east and west through the centre of Siberia; the ore is distributed through beds of sand and gravel, and is found throughout district of some thousands of square miles. The mines, it is supposed, were known to, and worked by the ancients; but they had become forgotten, and the description of them, left by Herodotus, was believed to be a fable. But chance rediscovered them towards the close of the last century, and they began to be regularly worked. Some of the mines belong to the Government; others are worked by private companies. The quantity raised has gone on steadily increasing; for the year 1846, the amount produced was valued at between four and five millions sterling.

The Government of Russia, adopting an old Eastern policy, hoards its money and bullion, leaving the business of the country to be carried on with paper; and the accumulation of metal in the cellars of the Government; and thus it was that Nicholas could spare his millions for investment when England and France were in the position of borrowers. Yet, while this is the case, there is yet a curious inconsistency to be noted. While the Russian Government had piled up in the cellars of one of its fortresses, some millions in bullion, its paper was so depreciated that the paper rouble passed only at a fourth of its nominal value! The nation at large derived no benefit from these great hoards of gold; they did not render the paper "convertible;" the gold might as well not have existed as not have been used: paper, it is evident, cannot run alone.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been chiefly remarkable for the continued high temperature, which has been every day some degrees above the average of the season. The sky has been a good deal clouded; the direction of the wind, at the beginning of the week, was principally E., and, towards the middle of the week, it veered to S.W. The atmosphere has generally been in a humid state. The following are some particulars of each day:—

Thursday, the sky was covered by cloud throughout the day; the direction of the wind was N.E., and S.E.; the average temperature of the day was 57½°; and that of the week ending this day, was 57°°. Friday, with the exception of some clouds early in the morning, the day was cloudless; the wind was from the E.; and the average temperature of the day was 52½°. Saturday, the sky was nearly covered by cloud throughout the day; the wind was from the E.N.E.; and the average temperature of the day was 54½. Sunday, a fog, at times very dense, more or less prevailed throughout the day; the air was calm; the average temperature of the day was 54½°. Monday, the sky was for the most part covered by cloud, rain was falling occasionally; the direction of the wind was S.W.; the average temperature of the day was 54½. Tuesday, the appearance of the sky was variable, but, for the most part, was nearly free from clouds; the direction of the wind was W.S.W.; and the average temperature of the day was 57°. Wednesday, the day was fine; the sky was nearly cloudless; the direction of the wind was S W., and the average temperature of the day was 54½°. Thursday, the sky was covered by cloud till 10h. A.M., and, during the morning, rain to the depth of three-tenths of an inch fell. After 10h. A.M., the sky was mostly clear, it being, at times, dotted by cumuli clouds: the direction of the wind was W., and blew strongly; the average temperature of the day was 54½°; and that of the week was 54½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

LOLA MONTES.—Among the curiosities which most attract strangers visiting Munich at the present moment, perhaps the most curious is the residence of the Countess of Lansfeld, the celebrated Lola Montes. Among the apartments thrown open to public admiration is the Countess's bed-chamber, which is fitted up with Royal magnificence of taste. On the table in this room is a rare ornament—a superb album is laid out, filled with pieces of poetry, written in German, and in celebration of the charms of the beautiful Countess, and on an embroidered cushion upon the same table a hand, sculptured in marble, is shown as a representation of "the Royal hand that wrote the verses."

SHAKESPEARE AND THE UNITED STATES.—The New York Weekly Mirror coolly says—"Meetings have been held in England, and subscriptions entered into for the purpose of purchasing what is deemed a national trophy, and it is not a little flattering to observe that one of the moving causes of anxiety on the subject was an apprehension that the Americans were about to interfere, purchase, and carry off the treasure bodily to the United States. Now, if it be still practicable, we think this fear ought to be realized. Shakespeare belongs more to the people of the United States than he does to the people of Great Britain."

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR, THURSDAY EVENING.—(From our own Correspondent.)—Her Majesty and the Prince Consort walked in the Home-park this morning, visiting the private kennel and the Royal aviary on their return to the Castle. His Serene Highness Prince Lowenstein and his Excellency the Chevalier Bunsen, took leave of the Queen and the Prince this morning, and proceeded to London, from Slough, by the Great Western Railway. Prince Albert, attended by Colonel Seymour, rode out on horseback in the morning to Stoke, and returned to the Castle to luncheon with her Majesty. The Royal family were taken for their usual carriage and equestrian exercise both in the morning and afternoon. The Prince Consort drove her Majesty out for an airing in the afternoon in a pony phaeton and pair through the Long Walk into the Great Park. The Royal dinner party in the evening included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Duchess of Sutherland, the Baroness de Speth, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, Miss L. Dawson Damer, &c. A splendidly ornamented copy of "A Letter to the Queen," relating to the State Apartments, has been presented to her Majesty by the Author.

THE DUCHESS OF CAMBRIDGE.—The Duchess of Cambridge, the Princess Mary, and suite, arrived at the Three Kings Hotel, Basle, on Thursday, the 14th inst.

THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON.—The Duke of Wellington arrived at Apsley House on Monday from Walmer Castle, and left town in the afternoon on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor Castle. His Grace returned to Walmer Castle on Wednesday.

BANQUET AT THE ADMIRALTY.—The Earl of Auckland, First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Honourable Miss Eden, gave a grand banquet on Monday night, at the noble Earl's official residence in the Admiralty, the guests including the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde and Lady Emily de Burgh, the Earl and Countess Grey, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount Morpeth, the Hon. Captain Keppel, Mr. Hooker, and Mr. Brooke.

FASHIONABLE DINNER PARTY.—The Earl and Countess Grey gave an elegant dinner on Tuesday to a distinguished party, at their mansion, in Belgrave-square. The guests included his Excellency the Duke de Broglie, the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis and Marchioness of Clanricarde, and Lady Emily de Burgh, Viscount and Viscountess Palmerston, Viscount Anson, the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay, &c.

THE COUNTESS DE FLAHAULT.—The Countess de Flahault (Baroness Keith and Nairne) left town on Tuesday for Vienna, his Excellency the Count having some time preceded her.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS.

On Tuesday afternoon, a deputation from the bankers, merchants, shipowners, and others interested in the trade of Liverpool, waited upon Lord John Russell in Downing-street, for the purpose of presenting a memorial agreed to a few days since, and signed by a large number of merchants, shipowners, and traders connected with that port, praying that the Government might immediately adopt whatever measures in their opinion they considered most advisable to relieve the pressure which now weighs so heavily on all the commercial classes of the community.

The deputation was also authorised to represent to the Noble Lord the depressed condition of trade and manufactures in Liverpool and its neighbourhood, owing to the extreme difficulty which the most wealthy houses experience in the attempt to convert securities into money.

The deputation, which consisted of ten gentlemen, included the following:—Mr. William Brown, M.P. (South Lancashire), Mr. Cardwell, M.P. (Liverpool), Mr. Wilson Patten, M.P., Mr. G. H. Laurence (Mayor of Liverpool), Mr. T. B. Horsfall, Mr. Charles Turner, Mr. William Steward, Mr. James Chapman, and Mr. Wesley.

Mr. Brown and Mr. Cardwell introduced the deputation to Lord John Russell. The Right Hon. Sir Charles Wood (Chancellor of the Exchequer), and the Right Hon. H. Labouchere (President of the Board of Trade), were also present.

Lord J. Russell received the deputation with much courtesy, and expressed the willingness which he and his colleagues present felt to hear any representations which the bankers, merchants, and shipowners of Liverpool were prepared to make with respect to the pressure now experienced by the mercantile community of the country.

Mr. Steward, Mr. Brown, and other gentlemen of the deputation, then proceeded to direct the attention of the noble Lord to the critical position in which the merchants and traders of Liverpool were placed, in consequence of the existing pressure on the Money Market, and the deplorable condition of trade, commerce, and manufactures. At the present time, produce of every kind could only be disposed of at an enormous sacrifice, which must, sooner or later, if carried to any great extent, involve the trader in ruin. Orders from abroad for goods or produce could not be executed, from the impossibility of converting into cash the bills drawn against them. The deputation could not refrain from expressing their opinion that much of the alarm and want of confidence which now prevailed amid all classes might in great part be allayed by the judicious interference of the Government. The memorial which they (the deputation) were charged to present to his Lordship dwelt strongly upon this subject, and set forth that, in the opinion of the memorialists, a temporary advance by Government, to be secured upon the credit of the country, would effect an immense amount of benefit for the mercantile classes, and by tending to allay groundless alarm, cause the return to circulation of large sums of money now locked up, and comparatively profitless, in consequence of the panic which prevailed. An advance of this description, they contended, it was the duty of the Government to make, as a continuance of the present state of things would inevitably have the effect of depriving hundreds and thousands of the labouring population of all classes of their employment, and thus prostrate the great industrial resources of the country. The accounts daily received from the manufacturing districts showed that houses of the greatest respectability and ample resources had been before the overwhelming pressure of the present crisis, and that the deputation had been requested to call the serious attention of Government to the necessity of instantly taking such commercial affairs, agreed in thinking that if Government did not immediately come to the relief of the bankers, merchants, and traders, on whose prosperity so much of the welfare of the country depended, the result would be that firms now solvent, and possessing ample means (if their securities were convertible into ready money), would be involved in the common ruin.

Lord John Russell admitted that the pressure under which the commercial classes laboured at present was very great, and a subject of deep regret. The matter was one which had occupied, and he assured the deputation would occupy, the attention of her Majesty's Government. He regretted, however, to say that he could not hold out any hope to the deputation that the Government could interfere in such a way as to allay the public apprehension, restore confidence, and relieve individuals from pressure. The subject, however, should receive from her Majesty's Ministers that attentive consideration due to the great importance of the interests involved.

The deputation then presented the memorial, which the noble Lord assured them should receive his best consideration.

The gentlemen of the deputation having thanked Lord John Russell and his right honourable colleagues for the exceedingly courteous manner with which they had been received and their representations listened to, withdrew.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer took an animated part in the discussion, and the impression left upon the minds of the deputation was that the right hon. gentlemen had not, up to that period, been thoroughly acquainted with the extent of the alarming pressure that existed. The right hon. gentleman admitted the distressing position of commercial affairs.

The interview lasted upwards of an hour and a quarter.

THE CITY OF LONDON REGISTRATION.

The following is a summary of the revision for 1847:—

	Liberal. Allowed.	Liberal. Disallowed.	Tory. Allowed.	Tory. Disallowed.
Livery	1	1	1	4
Household	160	388	6	63
	164	389	7	67

OBJECTIONS.

	Expunged. Liberal.	Tory.	Double.	Failed or Withdrawn. Liberal.	Tory.	Double.
Livery ..	130	96	62	43	111	1
Household ..	280	952	288 ..	353	735	30
Total ..	410	1050	350 ..	396	854	31

NUMBER OF CASES.

Livery	455
Household	3253
Total	3708

Of the large number of names thus erased from the lists on objections, it appears on examination, that the majority is composed of names appearing as new, the numbers being as under:—

	L.	T.	Dble.
Erased on objections by	L.	T.	Dble.
Of names on present register	263	295	90
Of new names	147	755	260
Total erased	410	1050	350

The success of either party may be thus condensed:—

	L.	T.
Claims allowed	164	7
Claims disallowed	(T.) 67	(L.) 389
Objections sustained	410	1050
Objections sustained by both parties	350	350
Objections failed	(T.)364	(L.) 396
Objections sustained by both parties	31	31
	1886	2203
Deduct claims disallowed	67	389
	1819	1814

The large number of claims disallowed to either party is accounted for by claims being made anticipatory of any objection to an erroneous description in the list, which, should no objection be made, becomes unnecessary; and in those cases where an objection has been made and sustained, and the claim also allowed, the claim has been counted as disallowed, and the objection failed. If allowed, the claim has been counted as disallowed, and the numbers will stand as in the above last line.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held on Monday afternoon, at the Foreign Office, which sat two hours and a half.

GYMNASIUM IN THE REGENT'S PARK.—The Commissioners of Woods and Forests have erected a gymnasium on the ground at the foot of Primrose-hill, which will be open for the use of the public under certain regulations. On Sunday, many hundreds of people availed themselves of the amusement afforded by this new feature in the locality.

LORD MAYOR'S OLDEN TIME.—A Court of Aldermen was held on Tuesday, when some curious extracts were read, which had been recently selected from some old documents contained in boxes which had been deposited in the cellar of the Mansion-House. We select a few of these extracts:—"1686, August 6th. Ordered by his lordship, that indigent officers, bearing the Queen's letters patent, have the sole right of raffling, lotteries, and other games, at the then ensuing Bartholomew and Southwark fairs.—1685, August 12th. Ordered, that certain buildings in course of erection in the City, be stayed forthwith for irregularity in the manner of the new rank is a necessary qualification, and Mr. Cookson has for some time been in a position to proceed to his B.D. degree.]

M.A.—J. A. Talk, Trinity College; G. Coleman, Christ's College (Grand Compounder).

THE BISHOPRIC OF MANCHESTER.—The Rev. James Prince Lee, M.A., head master of King Edward's Free School, Birmingham, has been appointed Bishop of the recently created see of Manchester. The reverend gentleman was formerly second master of Rugby School, at the time when the late Dr. Arnold was principal, and succeeded to the head mastership of King Edward's School, in Birmingham, on the appointment of his predecessor, Dr. Jeune (now master of Pembroke College, Oxford), to the Deanery of Jersey.

DECEASE OF THE REV. THE MASTER OF ST. PETER'S.—The Rev. W. Hodgson, D.D., the respected master of St. Peter College, Cambridge, died on Saturday last, at his official residence in Trumpington-street.

HORN FAIR.—This scene of annual amusement, in the pleasant village of Charlton, near Blackheath, commenced on St. Luke's Day (Monday), and closed on Wednesday. The origin of this fair is not known in records or traditions. It was formerly a mart for all sorts of articles made of horn. Coarse jokes were passed off among the visitors; but at the present day there is an improvement in public manners. On the first day the pleasures of the fair were nearly stationary. Another hand of rain. Tuesday and Wednesday being remarkably fine, a deal of company came from London, and partook of the good things prepared for them. There was an agricultural show of cattle, ornamental flowers, and sports of all kinds. The fair was more interesting this October than it has been for some years past.

PROSPECT FOR BRITISH SEAMEN.—There is now living at Lewes, a poor old man, of the name of Samuel Tickner. He was not only in the battle of the Nile, man, of the name of Samuel Tickner. He was not only in the battle of the Nile, but was rewarded by where he was wounded, but also in that of Copenhagen, and was rewarded by two brass medals for his services. He is now furnishing out a new pension, but he is getting out, at the age of 73 and upwards, a bare existence on 2s. 6d per week. His sufferings during last winter were very great. Of course he could not go fire, so he begged to go to one or two boarships, or some tradesmen in the town who have known him, and sit in their shops to warm himself; otherwise he must have perished. He had not enough bread—never, or rarely, any meat—his drink was bread and water. He has applied for a pension, but the reply is, it's too late—beyond the statute of limitations; so the Government have shuffled out of the payment.

ANECDOTE OF GENERAL TAYLOR.—A volunteer, lately returned from the war, tells a little anecdote of old "Rough-and-Ready," which is sufficiently characteristic to render it worthy of preservation. The General was in command of the convoy of stores, the night previous to the glorious conflict at Buena Vista, for the purpose of hearing their suggestions in relation to the approaching battle. A good deal of uneasiness was exhibited—objections were raised—the disadvantages of our numerous "odds" were urged—the propriety to retire and wait for reinforcements were urges—some were for giving the enemy battle—and one proposed that the American army should "fall back"—when the old General rose and said, "Are you all done, gentlemen?" Every one had finished. "Then, gentlemen, I will adjourn this meeting," coolly added Taylor, "till after the fight, to morrow!" "Good!" was the unanimous response. The battle was fought, and gloriously won.—New York Literary Gazette.

HORRIBLE DEATH OF A BOY.—Early on Friday morning (last week), a little boy named Woodcock, the son of Joseph Woodcock, a collier, residing at Hart's-hill, Worsenbrough, met with a frightful accident, which resulted in instant death. It appears that the unfortunate boy proceeded to the colliery of Messrs. Iron and Co., at Hart's-hill, to take his father's breakfast, and while he was in the act of stooping over the mouth of the pit in which his father was at work, to place the food in the skip, the poor little fellow lost his balance, and was precipitated to the bottom of the shaft, being very much mutilated in the descent.

POSTSCRIPT.

INTERRUPTION OF THE NEGOCIATIONS WITH MEXICO.

An express from Liverpool arrived yesterday, with the following important news:—

"The Oxford has arrived in the Mersey, with New York papers to the 1st. They state that the negociations between the United States and Mexico had been broken off, and that almost immediately afterwards, active hostilities had been recommenced between the belligerents in the north of which has been that General Scott was in possession of all the principal streets of Mexico, having, however, previously lost no less than three thousand men. The loss of the Mexicans is not stated."

DISTURBANCE AND CRIME IN IRELAND.

The Irish papers received yesterday contain accounts of rioting in the county of Limerick and elsewhere, in addition to several steam rs at murder. On Monday last, about 800 men from the surrounding parishes proceeded to the Newbarrack, fell in with a most tremendous crash. Several men were upon it at the time James, youngest son of William Varity, of Otley, had his brains dashed out; another young man, named Drake, was buried beneath the ruins, and it is feared he will be got out for some time; another was dreadfully injured, and two others very narrowly escaped with their lives, by clinging to a few remaining stones.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN

Our Madrid letters of the 15th instant, inform us that the King received Queen Christina on her arrival at the Palace, and remained closeted with her and the Queen for about three hours. In the course of this conference, the Ministers were summoned to the Queen's presence, but only the Minister of Justice and General Narvaez were able to attend. The Queen, says the Heraldo, received her mother with every demonstration of affection, clasping her in her arms, and shedding tears of joy. The Espanol states that her Majesty also embraced the Duke de Blanzares, with great apparent affection, to which the Duke, who had remained at a respectful distance during the first meeting of the Royal mother and daughter, replied by kissing the Queen's hand with great respect. On the evening of the 14th, Queen Christina dined with the King and the Queen.

ITALY.

Another grand political demonstration took place at Bologna on the 10th, on the inauguration of the bust of the Pope, which had been sent by the Romans in exchange for the Bolognese flag. The Government and Municipal Authorities, the National Guard, and all the population took part in the fête. The Marquis Potenziani, who was at the head of the deputation which was charged by the Romans to present the bust to the Municipality, delivered a speech before Cardinal Amat and all the civil and military authorities, in which, after recommending union, energy, and prudence, he said that the Pope had addressed the deputation and himself as follows:

"I am penetrated with the wise conduct of my very dear city of Bologna. Assure the Bolognese of my peculiar affection, and tell them that, among the exceptions for which Providence has showered on me, that of the union of my well-beloved subjects is not the least."

Some other speeches were delivered, and among them one by M. Galletti, in the name of the National Guard, in the course of which he said, that though Pius IX., as the Vicar of God, was obliged to preach peace, he was, nevertheless, an Italian, and protector of the sacred liberty and dignity of Italy. Words of peace did not prevent him from remember that the armour of Julius II. had been suspended for three centuries on the walls of the Vatican, that before it many of the enemies of Italy had fled, and added the cry of Scribini's patriotic song, in his anger, "Expulsion of the foreigners." This speech excited great enthusiasm.

Several arrests have recently taken place at Naples. Among the persons arrested are the Barons Marsico and Corzolino, two worthy inhabitants of Cosenza, who had just arrived in Naples.

A letter from Leghorn states that the small republic of San Marino, which reckons no more than about 8,000 citizens, has also escaped from being affected by the agitation which surrounds it. Its senate, which was composed of 70 burghers, has been transformed into a chamber of representatives. Every citizen is an elector, and the sittings are to be public. All this has been accomplished without any disturbance or opposition. It is said that the Secretary-General, M. Bonelli, has been sent to Paris on a special mission.

The Grand Duke of Lucca with Tuscany was made an occasion for a popular manifestation at Florence on the evening of the 11th. An immense crowd assembled round the Pitti Palace, which is the residence of the Grand Duke, and uttered shouts of "Long live Leopold the Second, the father of his country long live the reform Prince and the junction of Lucca."

THE CHOLERA AT TREBIZOND.—The Nouvelliste of Marseilles publishes intelligence to the 4th instant, which is of a very serious character, respecting the cholera. It is by the effect and on the 20th September it was em-grating, and that out of 60,000 inhabitants, not 40 000 remained in the city. The Consuls had struck their flags, and the members of the Consulate who had not been able to obtain country houses, had established themselves in tents, in intrenched positions, protected by a little river. All the country houses, farms, and villages, in the neighborhood of the city, had been transformed into citadels and fortresses. In the hope of keeping off the dreaded disease. The extraordinary abundance of fruits, which form the principal food of the poorer classes, had, it was said, caused the disease to spread. The contrality had exceeded those of the usual days of pestilentia visitations. Isolation was no protection against the malady, for it frequently broke out suddenly in the midst of a family, which had had no communication with any one diseased, and carried off three or four persons, and sometimes the whole household.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER'S SQUADRON.—The squadron, under the command in chief of Rear-Admiral Sir Charles Napier, is in the Tagus on the 6th instant. It then consisted of the St. Vincent, 120, Captain Milne, flag of the Commander-in-Chief; Caledonia, 120, Captain M. H. Dixon; Queen, 110, Captain Sir H. Leeke; Howe, 104, Captain Sir Thomas Hastings; Endymion, 48, steam frigate, Captain Henderson, C.B.; Odin, 16, steam-frigate, Captain the Hon. F. Pelham; Firebrand, 5, steam-frigate, Captain Dacres; Dragon, 6, steam-vessel, Captain Hewlett; Locust, 4, steam-sloop, Captain Fisher; and Arrow, 4, steam vessel, Lieut.-Commander Western. Total, 10 vessels, with above 400 guns, and 3500 men. There was no probability of the squadron going to sea; Sir Hamilton Seymour, the British Ambassador, requested it to remain in the Tagus. Some intrigues were understood to be carrying on by the Spaniards.

DEATH OF MAJOR-GENERAL RAY.—This officer, who was formerly connected with the Rifle Brigade, died on the 14th instant, at Elcho House, near Bury St. Edmund's, in the 72nd year of his age. He entered the army in 1790, was promoted to a Colonelcy in 1837, and to a Major-Generalship by the last Brevet.

PROMOTION OF THE EARL OF DUNDONALD'S SON.—The Earl of Auckland has promoted the Hon. Arthur Archibald Leopold Cochrane, third son of Vice-Admiral the Earl of Dundonald, K.C.B., who has passed in seamanship on board the Collingwood, 80, in the Pacific, in April, 1845, and at the Royal Naval College, Portsmouth, last week, to the rank of Lieutenant, dating his rank from the June of passing in the Collingwood.

H. M. S. America, 50 guns, Captain Sir T. Maitland, which our readers will recollect took so prominent a part in the capture of the Amazon Steam-frigate, in May last (See No. 268 of our Journal), arrived, last week at Plymouth, and has been inspected by the Admiral of the Port, and has been reported "in all respect in the state in which a British ship-of-war should be."

THE CHOLERA.—One victim has fallen to the cholera at Vienna. He died on the 7th inst., in the hospital, and the medical men of Vienna all coincided in the opinion that it was a case of Asiatic cholera.—Letters from Galicia contradict the reports that the disease having appeared in that country. The typhus or black fever is raging there, and some persons had died of dysentery. Some sharp frosts had set in, and the cases were less frequent.—Letters from Constantinople, of the 1st instant, state that no case of the disease had manifested itself in that city, but that it was spreading along the shores of the Black Sea. A number of persons had fallen victims to it at Odessa. The number of deaths at Trebizonde was 5000 persons had been attacked, 1620 of whom had died. In Constantinople, where the cholera has made its appearance, to study the progress of the malady.—Letters from St. Petersburg, of the 9th ult., state that on the authority of the official Gazette of Warsaw, the cholera continued to advance towards the north and east. Cases of it had occurred at Orel, at Toula, and even in the village of Penza, situated at only fifty leagues from Moscow. In the province of Astrakan, in which there were 31,000 inhabitants, 9813 cases had occurred, and 3131 deaths. The disease still raged with great severity at Tscharno Jarsk and in the environs. At Saratof, the capital of the province of that name 2500 persons had been attacked, 1620 of whom had died. In the country of the Cossacks of the Don there had been 12,651 cases, of which 7017 terminated fatally. At Charkov 53 persons had been carried off, and on September 14th there were 588 sick at Kursk. At Woronesch, a town with a population of 44,000, the cholera broke out on the 4th of September, and 420 new cases and 150 deaths had occurred daily. On the 16th, there were 1015 persons ill of the disease in the hospital, 418 of whom were attacked the same day. The number of deaths on that day was 130.

MAN RUN OVER BY A RAILWAY TRAIN.—On Sunday afternoon an inmate of the Bluebell-inn, on the railway, named John Birtwistle, aged 76, was killed on the railway near Lower Darwen. The two o'clock train from Blackburn had reached within half a mile of Lower Darwen, when the engine-driver observed a man walking on the line, about 300 yards before the train. The man was walking between the rails of the line not used by the train, and the engine-driver took no notice of him; but, as the train neared, he crossed and walked between the rails ahead of the train. The engineer blew the alarm whistle, shut off the steam, and reversed the engine, the guard and stoker at the same time putting on their breaks; but the distance between the deceased and the engine was so near on the rails, was too short to allow of the train being stopped before reaching him. It struck him down and passed over him, with the exception of the last of the seven carriages. He was dead when taken up. One of his legs was completely bruised, and his skull was very badly fractured. An inquest was held on the body, in the workhouse, on Monday night, when the jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

THE LATE ARTFUL SWINDLING AT MANCHESTER.—Charles Walter Fitzclarence, an account of whose impostures was given in the ILLUSTRATED NEWS a short time since, in having obtained goods from Manchester tradesmen, by falsely representing himself to be "the Hon. Charles Walter Fitzclarence, captain of the 11th Hussars," was brought up for trial on Tuesday, at the Manchester Borough Sessions, on the charge of false pretences, and pleaded guilty. He was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment in Lancaster Castle.

COMMITTAL OF TWO COAL-MASTERS FOR ROBBERY.—Two extensive coal-masters of West Bromwich Mr. W. Heybould and Mr. W. Salter were committed at Birmingham on Saturday, on a charge of stealing 545 tons of coal, by working their mine under the neighbouring property of Mr. Elisha Caddick.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

CAMBRIDGE. Oct. 20.

At a Congregation this day holden, the following degrees were conferred:

B. D—Rev H. W. Cookson, Peterhouse College. (From the above it may be inferred that Mr. Cookson is one of the candidates for the Mastership, as the attainment of the above rank is a necessary qualification, and Mr. Cookson has for some time been in a position to proceed to his B.D. degree.]

M.A.—J. A. Talk, Trinity College; G. Coleman, Christ's College (Grand Compounder).

THE MERCHANTS' WALK (SOUTH WEST ANGLE), ROYAL EXCHANGE.

MERCHANTS ON 'CHANGE.

ALTHOUGH, on the completion of the New Royal Exchange, we Illustrated, in our Journal, the principal features of this magnificent edifice, we have not hitherto presented our readers with any scene from the actual business of the Exchange. The annexed Engraving shows a portion of the Ambulatory or Merchants' Walk at the South West Angle, reminding us of Addison's fine reflections on a similar scene in the Exchange of his time:

"There is no place in the town," says he, "which I so much love to frequent as the Royal Exchange. It gives me a secret satisfaction, and in some measure gratifies my vanity, as I am an Englishman, to see so rich an assembly of countrymen and foreigners consulting together upon the private business of mankind, and making this metropolis a kind of emporium for the whole earth. I must confess I look upon Royal Exchange to be a great council, in which all considerable nations have their representatives. I there see the trading world are what ambassadors are in the politic world: they negotiate affairs, conclude treaties, and maintain a good correspondence between those wealthy societies of men that are divided from one another by seas and scas, or live on the different extremities of a continent. I have often been pleased to hear disputes adjusted between an inhabitant of Japan and an Armenian, or to see a subject of the Great Mogul entering into a league with one of the Czar of Muscovy. I am insensibly delighted to see nations which are at war in Europe, as they are distinguished here in their different walks and different languages. Sometimes I am jostled among a body of Armenians, sometimes I am lost in a crowd of Jews, and sometimes make one in a group of Dutchmen. I am a Dane, Swede, or Frenchman at different times; or rather fancy myself like the old philosopher, who, upon being asked what countryman he was, replied that he was a citizen of the world. This grand scene of business gives me an infinite variety of solid and substantial entertainment."

THE CLEARING HOUSE.

THE Clearing House is an important adjunct to the vast business of the London Bankers, by means of which a great saving of time and money is effected. The present Clearing establishment is situated in the corner of a court at the back of the Guardian Insurance Office, in Lombard-street. The working of the establishment may be thus briefly explained.

The cheques and bills of exchange, on the authority of which a great part of the money paid and received by bankers is made, are taken from each of the Clearing-bankers to the Clearing-house, several times in the day; and the cheques and bills drawn on one banker are cancelled by those which he holds on others.

There are very few persons in London, unconnected with banking, who have entered the precincts of this celebrated establishment. It is fitted up with desks for each of the Clearing-bankers, whose names, taking the first of each firm, are arranged in alphabetical order over each desk.

Mr. Tate, who, in his "Modern Cambist," has fully explained the system, says: "The rapidity with which the last charges are required to be entered, and the bustle which is created by their swift distribution through the room are difficult to be conceived. It is, then, on the point at striking four, and on days of heavy business that the beauty of the alphabetical arrangement of the clearer's desk is to be seen. All the distributors are moving the same way round the room with no further convenience than may arise from the more active pressing upon or outstripping the slower of their fellow-assistants. With equal celerity are their last credits entered by the clearers. A minute or two having passed, all the noise has ceased. The deputy-clearers have left with the last charges on their houses; the clearers are silently occupied in casting up the amounts of the accounts in their books, balancing them, and entering the differences in their balance-sheets, until at length announcements begin to be heard of the probable amounts to be received or paid, as a preparation for the final settlement. The four o'clock balances having been entered in the balance-sheet, each clearer goes round to check and mark off his accounts with the rest, with, 'I charge you,' or 'I credit you,' according as each balance is in his favour or against him.

In 1810, when forty-six banks settled with each other at the Clearing-house, the accounts cancelled in one day have sometimes, it is said, amounted to £15,000. In the Appendix to the Second Report of the Select Committee of the House of Commons on Banks, there is a return of the payments made through the Clearing-house for the year 1839, and, omitting all sums under £100, the total was £954,401,600. The average for each day would consequently be rather more than £3,000,000 sterling (the actual payments range from £1,500,000 to £6,260,000), while that of the sums actually paid was about £913,000. It has, however, sometimes happened that a single house has had to pay above half a million of money. The payments through the Clearing-house of three bankers, in 1839, ranged from £100,000,000 to £107,000,000 each.

NUMA IN THE GROTTO OF EGERIA.

As an interesting memorial of the genius of the late Mr. Howard, R.A., we have engraved one of his most pleasing pictures—"Numa in the Grotto of Egeria," in the possession of B. Hicks, Esq. The subject is the classic story of the loves of Numa and Egeria:—

EGERIA! emanation of the mind
That beam'd on Roma, like the shepherd's star,
Hymning the song of peace to human kind,
Guiding the warrior from his battle-car;
Wisely did Numa, in the days afar,
Take loving, prudent counsel from thy lips,
While fitfully upon thy Grotto's spar
Shone out the pale Moon from her shroud's eclipse.
Not Rhea, Circe, not Calypso—Thou,
Sweet goddess nymph! Thy love was vestal fire;
The smile of heaven lit up thy spotless brow,
And banish'd from thy heart all low desire;
Therein consigned to thee her peaceful tome,
To humanise the robber bands of Rome!

How breathlessly the peaceful King would hear
Thy words, and treasure them within his soul,
Resolved to mitigate Rome's red career,
And lead her sons beneath the law's control!
Vain was the effort!—Glory's baneful goal
Wiled the Eternal City to her doom—
The waves of Time o'er all her trophies roll,
And Cæsar's dust is scatter'd from its tomb:
Yet, Numa's name shall live—Egeria! thine,
Long as the world shall hallow law or peace—
Long as the minstrel's spirit may entwine
The song of love, and bid wars 'larums cease.

For ever sacred be the sylvan spot
Where Time's wing lingers o'er Egeria's grot.—L.

The reader will, probably, recollect that Lord Byron has enshrined in his "Childe Harold"

Egeria! sweet creation of some heart
Which found no mortal resting-place so fair
As thine ideal breast.
* * * * *
The mosses of thy fountain still are sprinkled
With thine Elysian water-drops; the face
Of thy cave-guarded spring, with years unwrinkled,
Reflects the meek-eyed genius of the place,
Whose green, wild margin now no more erase
Art's works; nor must the bubbling waters sleep,
Prison'd in marble, bubbling from the base
Of the cleft statue, with a gentle leap
The rill runs o'er, and round, fern, flowers, and ivy creep Fantastically tangled. * * *

Here didst thou dwell, in this enchanted cover,
Egeria! thy all heavenly bosom beating
For the far footsteps of thy mortal lover;
The purple midnight veil'd that Mystic meeting
With her most starry canopy, and seating
Thyself by thine adorer, what befel?
This cave was surely shaped out for the greeting
Of an enamoured Goddess, and the cell
Haunted by holy Love—the earliest oracle!—Canto IV.

"NUMA IN THE GROTTO OF EGERIA."—PAINTED BY THE LATE MR. HOWARD, R.A.

GOING TO CHURCH.

DRAWN BY BENDEMAN.

This is a landscape reposing in the stillness of the Sabbath, with a village congregation going to the House of God, through fields blessed with plenty. It is a scene which may be witnessed in many a village of South Germany. The roadside shrine to which the old man is reverently uncovering, will be immediately recognised by the traveller as a local feature. This painting belongs to the later style of Bendeman—the head of the Dusseldorf school. His earliest was the religious or symbolic-historical. His "Mourning Jews," taken from the Psalm; "By the Waters of Babylon we sat down and wept," is well known. Like his "Jeremiah on the Ruins of Jerusalem," it has had a great popularity as an engraving. He also excels in the Idyllic; and his scenes, taken from rural life, are very beautiful. Such are his "Two Girls at the Fountain," the "Harvest," the "Shepherd and Shepherdess," and the "Going to Church," which we have reproduced. The characteristic of Bendeman are as calm gentle temperament, deep religious feeling, and excessive modesty: all these may be traced in his works. He is the son of a rich banker of Berlin, and was a pupil of Schadow.

Blest is the Sabbath morn—and Germany!
Most holy dost thou keep the day of rest.
Heart-moving is the scene when o'er the lea,
Where the young Harvest rears aloft his crest,
Proceeds the congregation: Hoary Eld
And dimpled Childhood and the maiden fair,
Lowly and high by sacred thoughts impell'd,
Come to breathe forth the voice of praise and pray'r.
Blest is the Sabbath morn—and Germany;
Well dost thou keep the Christian Jubilee!

From thee, illustrious Land! sprang forth the hearts
That battled for soul-freedom.
And from thee
Religion joyfully receives the arts
Of Lyre and Pencil, noble Germany!
Long may thy worthy sons pursue the path
Of single-soul'd integrity—and stand
Aloof from party or sectarian wrath,
Bound by the love-bond to the Father-Land.
Blest is the Sabbath! Hallow'd ever be
The day of rest, true Germany! in thee!—L.

MUSIC.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, WEDNESDAY.—Nothing is talked of here, in the musical circles, but the immense triumph just achieved at four concerts given at the Académie Royale de Musique, on the 9th, 11th, 12th, and 16th instant, by the contralto Marietta Alboni. I arrived in Paris on the 14th, and was present at the concluding entertainment, on Friday last. I am now in a position to confirm in every degree, the statements you will have seen in the Parisian journals. Since the days of Madame Catalani, an old habitué assured me, that he had never heard such furore as at Alboni's singing. The applause reminded me of the reception given to Duprez, on his début: the Lind rapture at Her Majesty's Theatre, in a still more intense degree, may afford your home readers some notion of the scene. First, however, let me speak of the difficulty of entrance. At the opening of the box office, on Friday morning, I was astonished to find a queue, or line of people, formed as far as the Rue Grange Batelière, anxiously waiting their turn for admittance. Having purchased from a man in the front rank, who had planted himself there at daybreak, his position, I was one of the first in the office, and found to my annoyance that every stall in the orchestra, balcony, &c, and every seat in a box were already let the day before. Nothing was left but a reserved seat in the pit, from which three rows had been substracted, at orchestra stall prices, namely, ten francs each. On my way to the theatre in the evening, I asked of the ticket bawker, the price of an orchestra stall. He demanded fifty francs! I saw a couple of napoleons (forty francs) paid, by one determined amateur. These prices, for Paris, are enormous.

The interior of the house, densely crowded in every part, was magnificent; the great majority of the occupants in the boxes being elegantly-dressed ladies. The political, diplomatic, financial, literary, and artistical notabilities present were unusually great. At eight o'clock, after Weber's "Freyschutz" overture, with the text of which M Girard, the Conductor, took some liberties, the curtain rose for the concerted stage work, and discovered the chorus singers in evening dress, seated on a raised platform. After a pause, Mdlle. Alboni, dressed in white, appeared with her music in her hands. She advanced to the stage-lamps, and commenced the opening "Di tanti palpiti" of Rossini's celebrated opera, "Tancredi." After a few bars, one exclamation of wonder and delight broke from the auditory; and then, as she progressed, the murmurs of ecstacy were changed at the close into one overwhelming burst of thunders of applause; twice was the encore called for. After the fantastic "Chorus of Dervishes," from Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens"—singularly out of place at such a concert—Alboni and Barroilhet came forward, and sang the Figaro and Largo duet; the demands for the encore were irresistible. This terminated the first part of the concert. The second began with Rossini's "Guillaume Tell" overture, the solos for the violoncello, flute, &c., being very nicely played. Alboni then gave the scena "Pensa alla patria," from Rossini's "Italiana in Algeri," and was again twice called for at the end. After the "Prayer," from Rossini's "Moise," in which the fine bass voice of Alizard told well, Alboni sang the finale of the opera-seria, her famous "Brindisi," from Donizetti's "Lucrezia Borgia" Great as was the sensation she produced at the Royal Italian Opera in this drinking song, it was nothing in compa rison with the fervour displayed here. The roof of the building shook with acclamations, and the cries for bis, bis, the callings forward, &c., most vehement. I thought all was done when the curtain fell; but no! the auditory, en masse, insisted upon its being raised once more, to witness a parting cheer; and then was Alboni saluted with a floral shower, that occupied the chorus singers, attendants, &c., some time in picking up. Madme. Thiers threw her a bouquet of enormous size. Having had to notice so often the name of Alboni, whilst at Covent Garden, it is not necessary for me to pen a fresh criticism; but I do regret that your space will not permit me to translate the enthusiastic articles of Berlioz, in the Débats —of Fiorentino, in the Constitutionnel—of Theophile Gautier, in the Presse—of Gustave Héquet, in the National—of Scudo, in the Commerce—and of other eloquents notices in the France Musicale, in the Revue Musicale, in the Corsaire-Satan, in the Charivari, &c. Let it suffice, that ever was the genius of an artiste paid greater tribute to, than by the critics of the Parisian press.

Carlotta Grisi, in the part of "Giselle," danced exquisitely, after the Concert.

And now as to Alboni's future intentions. Up to the moment I write, she has signed no contract with the Académie. She has refused the highest offers from MM. Duponchel and Duquesnel, for the present; as, also, of M. Vatel, of the Théatre Italien, who had discovered too late the mistake he made, in not engaging her whilst he was in London. Alboni leaves to-morrow for Pesth, in Hungary; and all that I could learn from her is a kind of half-promise to sing at the French Opera, in February. She has signed with the Royal Italian Opera, and will open the season in London, in March.

Cerito is announced for the same time as that of "La Fille de Marbre." The day for Miss Birch's début is not yet fixed. Verdi's "Jerusalem," a French adaptation of "I Lombardi," is in active preparation. Duprez will have Mario's part, and Mdme. Albert dite Adam that of Hélène.

At the Théâtre Italien I find a great falling off. The orchestra has sadly retrograded, and the choruses are very indifferent. Madame Castellan's début in "Lucia" has been quite successful. Old and good English composition is, in the earlier scenes, but in the last act quite won the suffrages of the dilettanti. Mario's singing and acting in the last scene, as Edgar, electrified the house by its wonderful improvement The "Somnambula" has been given twice, with Madame Persiani, Mdlle. Corbari, Gardoni, and Tagliafico. The intonation of Madame Persiani is much at fault; but on Saturday, in the Allegro of the finale, she rallied in a manner to produce the most enthusiastic—her feats of execution were marvellous as in her best day. Gardoni was received very coldly: the charm of his voice is recognised, but the amateurs complain of his defective style and of his frigidity. Tagliafico is pushing ponderously; he says the air of the Count very acceptically. The mise en scène of the operas, by M. Vatel, is really too bad for a theatre having such a large subscription. The "Puritani" was given last night, with Grisi, Mario, Lablache, Bonconci, Polonini, &c. Complaints are heard that no attempts are made to get up a fresh repertoire.

Mr. Mitchell is here actively engaged in forming a troupe for opéra comique for the St. James's Theatre, to-night next month. Madame Meriden is also here, to engage, if possible, Madame Viardot Garcia, for English Opera, at Drury-Lane. It is also rumoured that Mr. Lumley has arrived. Mr. Costa is in Milan, making engagements for the Royal Italian Opera next season.

SONG OF THE SONDERBUND.

Brothers! although a "sunder'd band,"
Our hearts are with you still.
We are children of the Vaterland,
Sons of the vale and hill.
Our fathers conquered side by side,
Against an empire's might;
Still let us in ourselves confide,
And God defend the right!

Let Zurich raise her myriad men,
And Berne full many more,
Then comrades will the hill and glen
With a patriot people's gore;
But woe betide the fratricide,
Who rushes to the fray!
When gentle Peace might prove his guide,
And the God of Peace adored!

Rifles are round the Right Berg,
That never miss'd their aim;
And Kaenle keeps the bow of Tell,
And glories in his name
And 'twas by the Fier Walden See,
That freedom's shout arose,
When ponder lakes were slumbering
In the chains of base repose.

Then, by our freeborn hills around,
And the blessed stars above,
Our Eagle shall yet be found
Tame as the timid dove!
We feal not fear, for our right is clear,
The Freedom of the Soul;
For that the banner shall we rear,
Against a world's control.—L.

SCOTLAND.

The Lord Provostship of Edinburgh.—Mr. Black has consented to retain the office of chief magistrate for another year.

The Financial Crisis.—The academic visit of Lord John Russell to Glasgow is to be taken advantage of by the Lord Provost and magistrates, who are about to meet for the purpose of resolving as to the best means of bringing the state of the money market under his lordship's notice.

Improved Revenue at Glasgow.—It is very gratifying to find that the trade of Glasgow is still greatly on the increase; and that, although the duties on corn have been suspended for the last six months, the Customs revenue for the year just ended has reached £695,600, being an increase over the year preceding of £35,000; and that, while the revenue tables for Great Britain, now published, exhibit a falling off in the last quarter, there is an excess at Glasgow of above £22,000.

Fatal Accident on the Hawick Railway.—On Saturday a painter in Edinburgh, named James Milne, was killed on the Hawick Railway, at a point near Lasswade. It appears he had been walking between the rails, when a train, proceeding from Dalkeith to Gorebridge, came up and overtook him before he had stepped aside out of its way. The unhappy man was literally crushed to pieces.

Melancholy Accident at Edinburgh.—On Saturday evening Mr. Wilson, dentist, Young-street, Edinburgh, had the misfortune to witness a most heartaffecting kind. It appears he had gone to Trinity to visit a patient, and having done so, he proceeded to the railway station there, along with Dr. Scott, to return to Edinburgh by the seven o'clock train. The train having arrived, Mr. Wilson, it appears, had diverted himself by inspecting the accommodation at the station, and in doing so he opened a door which leads from the check office to a coal-cellar on the ground floor by a curved stair, which is surrounded at the threshold of the door. Never imagining that there would be any such descent, but that the door opened in a room with a floor quite level to that of the office, and it being dark, Mr. Wilson stepped forward, and immediately he fell down, falling on his back on the stair. On being taken up, it was found that his spinal cord had been ruptured, which caused paralysis of the extremities The unfortunate gentleman expired at the 9½ o'clock on Sunday morning. What renders the case peculiarly melancholy, is that his wife died about six weeks ago, leaving eight children, the youngest of whom is only three years of age.

Poisoning at Glasgow.—A man named Keenan, a labourer, living in Hunterstreet, Glasgow, died on Sunday, under circumstances leading to the belief that he had been poisoned; and on an officer's making inquiry into the circumstances, deceased's wife was apprehended on a charge of murder. A post mortem examination, by Dr. Easton, showed that the death of the man had been caused by laudanum; and it is believed that the drug was administered to him on Sabbath, while he was under the influence of liquor. Deceased was about 40 years old, and his wife is the same age.

Statistics of Pauperism.—The population of Sweden amounts to about 3,500,000 souls, and has only three mendicants in every 400 persons; while in Norway they reckon five out of every 100; in Denmark, 4; in Wurtemberg, 5; in Switzerland, 6; in Saxony, 7; and in the Tyrol, 8; and in the British Islands collectively, 17; although in England separately there are only 10. In France the number of foundlings supported at the expense of the State was, in 1844, 129,384, exclusive of those supported at the cost of 6,707 89f. 5c. a-head. In Paris the charitable establishments afford relief to 98,000 paupers. At Berlin the number of mendicants has become doubled between 1822 and 1845; the number of families in receipt of parochial relief has increased from 7,000 to 9,331. In London it is computed that there are 25,000 persons who daily practice mendicity or robbery.

Sea and Shore.—On Thursday morning a shark was discovered, at a short distance from St. Sampson's Harbour, Guernsey, by a fisherman and his crew, who were in a boat off that spot. They happened to have with them a harpoon and a musket, with which they attacked the voracious stranger. The former was lodged in its body, but, so far from disabling it, only rendered it furious; and it was not till it had been pierced by five bullets that it was deprived of life. The shark was then, with some difficulty, got into the boat and brought on shore, and proved to be about two years old, and one of the blue species, and measuring nearly eight feet. It had two rows of teeth, and the mouth was about a foot wide. A shoal of animals of this sort was seen a few days ago off Sark—a circumstance of very rare occurrence in that latitude.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

Next week will bring to a close the racing season of 1847 with the Houghton Meeting at Newmarket. That occasion will extend over the whole six days, and, according to the "Racing Calendar," which was published on the 19th instant, it will show, upon the lists, at all events, not less than sixty-five races—that is to say, fourteen for the first day, Monday, eight for Tuesday, nine for Wednesday, a dozen for Thursday, as many for Friday, and eight for Saturday. A large proportion are, of course, matches, and most probably these will be added to, especially on the last day, so as nearly, if not quite, to make up for the small sweepstakes and handicaps that may not fill. The Cambridgeshire is now the sole hope of the market: it is the la t lot on hand among the sweep and lottery dealers, who, however, taking time by the forelock, have already a substitute for it on the stocks. The Great Metropolitan Stakes—the first great handicap of the season, to be run for at the Epsom Spring Meeting has been put on the stage with indomitable spirit. Mr. Dorling, of racing-card immortality, was the founder of that sporting race; and, by a happy coincidence, and the co-operation of his friends, it bids fair, thus early, to be an Olympic lectisthan in 1848. They have subscribed handsomely and caused others to do the same, so that its bonus or premium already boasts of a hundred sterling—and that many each succeeding should it go on as it has begun. We wish good speed to Mr. Dorling, and his energy in favour of the especial racing ground of the metropolis. The citizens of London are indebted to him for a greatly improved system at their favourite course—for an increase of sport, and better facilities for enjoying it. Those who affect the Turf for the purpose of promoting gambling, do not share our good wishes with him.

As the cynosure of present speculation, we must deal with the Cambridgeshire, after the fashion of our contemporaries, but in a less ambitious character. A very considerable field has been touched upon in reference to it; but differing in policy from the investments on the Metropolitan, the outsiders have by no means been laid against in the desperate way they were for the issue which crowned the losses of Cuirbail and his party. The highest weight is 8st. 10lb.—the lowest 5st 4lb.—that is of those that accepted. Upwards of sixty of the animals named on the spot, and a very large start is certain to gladden the eyes of the fieldsmen. They cannot but have the best of it. The weights, if not a chef d'œuvre of handicapping, must bring the field too close together to be pleasant to the backer, or those who stand on anything at odds under two figures. As to picking at a winner, one might as well expect to find a new bat among the last lot after a public dinner. But the general policy of the Turf, grounded upon that of the leaders in the market is carefully dealt with. It's "anybody's race as the phrase goes; if you must bet toss with yourself for choice—or take our advice, and let the field win for you.

In a morning paper a few days ago, there was inserted a paragraph to the effect, that, "on authority," it stated that Mr Sleman, said to have been implicated in a recent smuggling transaction, "was not a member of the Royal Yacht Squadron." But this was a mistake. He was a member of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, as we stated last week—and on Thursday last that distinguished society met, to consider what steps should be taken in relation to that charge. A very large meeting was the result, and in the absence of the Commodore and Vice-Commodore, the chair was taken by Captain Wheeler, the Treasurer. A long and warm discussion followed, of which the chief feature was the emphasis with which speakers denounced smuggling in particular, and their resolution to deal with this case, when it should be more ripe. We refrain, however, from details, as this was not a regular meeting; and whatever else may be said, we defy any body to say that it was.

TATTERSALL'S.

Monday.—A very full muster, but more cry than wool. We may observe, however, that the following horses were really in force for the Cambridgeshire:—Geraldine, Giselle, Collingwood, Prior of St. Margaret's, Patriot, and Hydrangea. Some others were backed, but the outlay was in small sums.

On the Derby, however, a great change will be found in Queen Mary, who was backed back to 20 to 1, and was quite friendless. Glendower, Flatcatcher, and The Stinger were in great request

POLICE.

Violent Assault.—At Worship-street, on Tuesday, Charles Westbrook, a low, ruffianly-looking fellow, was charged with having committed a murderous assault upon his wife, by which she was so seriously injured that her life is in danger. It appeared, from the evidence of a policeman of the G Division, that he was on duty on Sunday night last, when he received information that a man had travelled with a woman, and had nearly killed her, by striking her on the head with a hammer. He proceeded to a court in Whitecross-street, where he found a large mob of persons, and a woman was bleeding from the head and insensible, and she was taken away for medical assistance. On making inquiries, he found that she was the prisoner's wife, and that, after quarrelling with her, he seized a large hammer, now produced, with which he beat her about the head, and injured her severely. He took the prisoner to the station-house. The officer produced a medical certificate stating that the woman was most seriously injured about the head, and the least excitement might endanger her life. Mr. Arnold asked the prisoner if he wished to say anything to the charge against him. The prisoner replied that he was very sorry for what had happened. The fact was that he was quite drunk, and did not know what he was about at the time. The constable said that on the Saturday night after the wife had received the injury, and when the prisoner was in custody, she said she did not wish to prosecute him. She was in a very bad state at the time. Mr. Arnold, however, paid no attention to this, and remanded that it was evident the woman must be in a bad state, and severely injured. He was accordingly remanded.

Stress of Plunder by a Shopwoman.—At Marylebone Office, on Thursday, a very smartly-attired young female, named Anne Simmons, shopwoman to Messrs. Marshall and Co., silk mercers, &c., in Vere-street, Oxford-street, was charged with having robbed her employers to a considerable amount. It appeared from the evidence, that the prisoner had been in the situation alluded to between two and three years, and that she had recently been suspected of having pursued dishonest practices; it was at length deemed advisable to give her in charge, and after she was looked up at the station-house an examination was made of her boxes, which were found to contain a large quantity of silk, satin, muslin, and other articles of a valuable description, having upon them marks which enabled Mr. Marshall to identify them as belonging to him and his partner. The officer produced a large box with the stolen goods in it, and it further appeared that the prisoner had sent to a person, in Woodstock-street, a number of other articles, in the absence, &c., to be made up for her. In reply to the magistrate, Mr. Marshall said that the amount of property which he had sworn to was about £25, but he had no doubt with regard to the system of plunder having been carried on by the prisoner to a much greater extent. The prisoner, on being asked what she had to say, replied that she had purchased many of the things of young men in the shop. Mr. Broughton, in order to afford time for the production of other evidence necessary for the completion of the case, remanded the prisoner.

Ingenious Tricks of Swindlers.—At the Mansion House, on Tuesday, Charlotte M'Gee, a notorious pettifogger, described as a female, and an able assumer of characters calculated to excite deep commiseration, was brought before the Lord Mayor by Horsford, the Mendicity Society's officer. The prisoner, who has been several times apprehended and convicted as a common impostor, was seen by Horsford dressed in deep mourning, and with a widow's cap closely over her head, and he had no doubt that she had been calling upon some of the charitable visitors of the City for contributions. Her husband, who was of the same profession, and in all probability carrying it on within a street or two, had been several times committed by magistrates, but had not a quarter of the experience of common goats to which his wife laid claim. The moment she saw the officer's face, than which she had often said she would rather have seen the devil, she ran into a public-house, and managed to get rid of her widow's cap, but was seized in possession of a petition, containing, in pathetic language, the sad of the bereavement, and of a letter, of which the following, which caused much laughter, is a copy. It was directed to her husband, who is called Peter M'Gee, alias Wood, alias Thompson:

Castle, Donnington, Sunday Evening.

Dear Friends—We hope these few lines will find each of you in the enjoyment of good health, as it leaves us all at present. We have been from Birmingham at the time your letter arrived there, or it would have been answered before; however, we hope this will reach your residence before you leave London. Give our best respects to Mrs. Adams, and tell her we are very sorry to hear of her husband being in trouble as well as others. We have been spending the time here very delightful since we left you, as well. We have been going it, we tell lately, thank God; got a double fee from a lady, and two pounds from another on Saturday last. We have dropped on some good places lately We have got a capital receipt for hair dye, which Richard says he will sell you for a trifle. We expect to be in Birmingham by the end of next week, and will address a letter to it as Joseph's in Old Thomas-street, where the old woman is still staying With best respects to all inquiring friends we remain, Your sincere friends, RICHARD and CHARLEY Horsford said he had ascertained, and he had received the willing assistance of the police, that every one of the signatures was fictitious, but he could not find any one to whom she had applied on the day he apprehended her. A venerable gentleman who was sitting next the prisoner, when the prisoner was put to the bar, said, "Why, that woman got half a sovereign from my wife some time ago at Brixton." (The Prisoner: Ah, Sir, you wickedly wanted to inveigle me. Laughter.)—The Lord Mayor said one of the villanous trade followed by the prisoner would not hesitate to make any charge, either for money or revenge. He much regretted that the evidence against her fell short of conviction, but she should be watched, and the punishment should certainly follow her conviction.—The prisoner: You shall never see my face again, nor my husband's, if we can get out of the City. The prisoner was then discharged.

The Commercial Crisis and the Bill-swindlers.—On Wednesday, at the Mansion-House, the Lord Mayor said it would appear as if the swindlers about town regarded the pressure as favourable for the existing commercial embarrassments, for he found that they were sending forth circulars headed "Commercial Information and temporary assistance to merchants, manufacturers, tradesmen, and persons gentlemen of respectability," and offering pecuniary accommodation to any extent upon goods, or good bills, &c. He had just received the following letter, enclosing long printed circulars of the kind alluded to, addressed from the Strand, and apparently, "By very respectfully, John Evans, Brothers, and Co., factors and commission-brokers."

My Lord,—I have this morning received the enclosed circular (for which I have been taxed with postage), and as it appears to me likely to be a source of scoundrelism, I venture to transmit them to your lordship, that the designs on the unwary in this season of commercial embarrassment, of the parties calling themselves "John Evans, Brothers, and Co., factors and commission brokers," may be exposed to your lordship may best judge. I have marked a paragraph in one of the circulars with red ink. I remain, &c

The paragraph is as follows:—"It is particularly requested, if this circular is of no immediate service, it may not be shown unless to a confidential and respectable friend, whose object it is likely to serve, or you might wish to avail yourself of the facilities on some future occasion, as in the instability of business we want, but respectability, and in the safe, quiet, mercantile manner which our friends have now for so many years approved of." The Lord Mayor observed, that such modes of advertising were called "begging letter-writing," and sufficient evidence of success, if there were not the positive and melancholy testimony of the victims who had from time to time addressed the Chief Magistrate to supplicate relief from the cruel fraud of which they had been subjected. He hoped that, at such a time as the present, those who suffered from a temporary emergency, would not make themselves liable to more severe and bitter injury, by becoming the dupes of the cool swindler. If those who joined in such a vile conspiracy happened to be within his jurisdiction, he should certainly proceed to very summary operations. The mischief accomplished by the failure of the many extensive firms which had been entirely misunderstanding the repeated exposures in the press, was, he was given to understand, incalculable. The only mode, he regretted to say, which he had of counteracting the future machinations of the gangs of swindling gentry who were preying on society, was by steadily and resolutely denouncing them in the justice-room, and thus recommending them to the wholesome castigation of the press, to which the public were so vastly indebted for its information and admonitions upon the subject.

Hereford Cathedral Restoration.—A county meeting in aid of this good work was held at Hereford, on the 14th instant. Sir Velters Cornewall, Bart., Peter Sherriff Esquire, and Lord Chamberlain Somers, the Earl Somers, Lord-Lieutenant of the County; the Bishop of Hereford; Joseph Bailey, jun. Esq., M.P.; F. H. Haggitt, Esq., M.P.; the Dean of Hereford; Archdeacon Wathen; and a number of other gentlemen were present. After the usual dinner-table, and at the social board, is not of rare occurrence, and it has always been attended with the happiest and best results." Both Members delivered elaborate addresses, which were enthusiastically cheered.

Public Appearance of Mr. Cobden at Manchester.—On Tuesday Mr. Cobden, M.P., made his first public visit since his return; and, as might be expected, the meeting to the chief seat of the cotton trade—the Free-Trade cause—the League Rooms, Newhall's-buildings, Manchester. A great number of Free-Traders it being the principal market-day—were present, and gave the honourable gentleman a most gratifying reception. Amongst the leading gentlemen present were James Pilkington, Esq., the new member for Blackburn; James Heywood, Esq., the new member for North Lancashire; and T. Bazley, Esq., President of the Manchester Chamber of Commerce. Mr. Cobden appeared to be in good health, though not more robust than when he left this country. It is believed that the hon. gentleman will elect to sit for the West Riding of Yorkshire, in the room of Mr. Stansfield, resigned, public opinion there being made of the fact.

Anecdote of Pius IX.—We find the following anecdote in some of the Paris journals.—"Cardinal Lambruschini wrote to several religious communities, engaging them to offer up prayers that the Pope might be removed from his state of blindness. One of these letters was sent to Pius IX., who caused the Cardinal to be invited to come and see him. The Cardinal having replied that he was ill, and could only go the next day, the Pope sent a message that he would wait on the Cardinal. On this the Cardinal hastened to the Quirinal, and on being introduced to the Pope, the Holy Father placed in his hands the letter which he had addressed to the communities. When the Cardinal had read it, the Pope said, 'You now understand that I could not go to bed without pardoning you.'"

So great is the rage for playing at cards in Russia just now, that in the imperial manufactory at St. Petersburgh 1200 dozen sets are made every day; that is to say, 14,400 sets a day, or 526,600 every year. This immense number is insufficient, and the nobility of St. Petersburgh have addressed a petition to the Government, which has the monopoly of this manufactory, to obtain an augmentation of the supply.

On the same night another fire broke out in a parallel street, but happily only one house was burnt. Another fire occurred, which proceeded with such rapidity that in an incredibly short time seventy houses were burnt to ashes.

Notwithstanding the excessive cold, he pr ceeded to pass the winter in the country, to make observations. Since his departure no news has been received of him.

Moscow enjoyed the spectacle of a very fine Aurora Borealis in the evening of the 24th ult. The light extended to 120 to 180 degrees on the horizon of the north, and was so strong that it caused the light of the moon to become pale. The London and North-Western Railway Company recently issued circulars to all companies with which they are connected, strongly recommending that, wherever it was practicable, railway works should be suspended for the present; and the recommendation has been adopted by most of the companies to which it was made. On the evening of the day on which M. Lédet made his ill-fated ascent, his sister w s attacked with sickness, of which she died the next day. A well known actor on the Edinburgh stage entered into an engagement with Jenny Lind, securing to her the powers for the gratification of the lieges in Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth; the terms were £400 per night. When the gifted Swede was performing in England she was taken ill, and as before that event considerable preparatory expenses had been incurred in Scotland, the speculator became rather alarmed, and accordingly insured the life of Jenny Lind for six weeks, for one thousand pounds. The only effect of this step was to reduce the gross profits of her visit by a twenty-pound note.

(c) White plays this part of the Game very well.
(d) Q to K Kt 4th, threatening to take the K R P with the Bishop, deserves consideration.
(e) Something decisive surely must have been gained by Mr. Harrwitz, but he has moved the Q to her 3d sq (?) Here, also, Q to her 8d appears much stronger play.

APOLLO'S LAST VISIT TO PARNASSUS.

A VERY IRREGULAR ODE.

A few weeks since the God of Day
Took in his glorious head to pay
A visit to Parnassus.
Long had the truant God neglected
A sourtesy so much expected;
But he had heard his favourite mount
Was ragged grown, and barren, and cold;
And that not even Helicon's fount
Could save his Nine from growing old.

A veil of roseate light was thrown
Over the ancient mountains brow;
The Graces and the Loves came down
Assisting at the show;
While Flora showers
Her choicest flowers,
And Zephyr, in a joyous rout,
Scatters their fragrance all about.

Three Muses alone, on the sacred hill,
Stood to attend the God;
Sliding down on a sunbeam, calm and chill,
He gave them a gracious nod.
The Historic Maid curtseying, laid by her quill,
Having taken the date
Of this visit of state.

Erato rang out a famous lyric,
In praise of Poetry, the Sun, and Physic;
Which Euterpe, to show off in modern sort, sa ?
Banishing lyre and flute,
And the old classic lute,
Touched fine on her grand piano-forte.

"But three!" his Godship seemed in a fix:
"But three! pray where are the other six?
Calliope," a "To Britain she went Stored with Hymettus' honey,
To touch the tongue of each hustings man,
And help the God of money."
"Electioneering!"
Quoth Apollo, sneering;
"Urania, where?' not with her, I hope."
"No sire, she is peering
Through my Lord Rosse's great telescope.
Our comic sister, in the St. James,
Is vaudevilling it.
In which she's reeling it.
The Muse of Song doth also fail,
For with one northern Nightingale
She's sweetly pealing it."

"Humph!" muttered the God of Day;
"The British bull-dog well doth pay
For his artistic education;
And may become, I still opine,
Like Greece and Rome in their decline,
A musical and dancing nation.

"Oh, Greece, my lost, my lovely one!
Now cold as monuments, stone,
Never shall cease to mourn for thee.
Mute is thy famed Euripides,
Trans Lachylus, thy Sophocles—
But hold—the Tragic Muse?—where, where is she?
My best-beloved, divine Melpomene?"

All stand abashed; to speak none dare;
Not even Echo answers "where?"
Apollo glowered with passion;
The beams around his head
Turned to a fiery red,
Till Clio gently said:—
"The Tragic Muse is out of fashion;
Therefore so poor that I much fear
She hath not wherewithal t' appear Before this splendid presence here.

"To London, on a spec, she lately went,
With travel sadly soiled, with labour spent,
Seeking for ancient temples; there were none;
And even Shakespere, her immortal son,
Had, with his latest friend Macready, flown.
In despair,
She turned her where
The booksellers held their mart,
With her last specimen of art.
"And first she went to Smith and Elder,
Who with civility repelled her.
Murray, patron of poetic sin,
Sighed as he prayed her to depart;
Murray gently bowed her out;
Pickering made her face about;
And Bentley, with excess many,
Closely shut up his Miscellany.
The indignant Muse with anger burned;
Her Shakespere's land she proudly spurned,
And, in her grief and rage, returned."

Thus spoke the Muse of History:
Her Elegiac sister touched a chord
Of the same lyre, so mournfully,
That tears filled eyes divine. Parnassus' lord,
With rage and sorrow in his face,
Forgetting every Love and Grace,
Rushed up into his dwelling-place.

And thence sent forth that Vision fair,
That form of bright, transparent air,
Which none can see—none can—
Rarely lost though never won.
Hope found the poor Muse where she sate
With locks thrown back, and head upraised,
And parted lips, and eye that gazed,
Full of her God's resplendent ray.
She had caught the sound of Rachel's song,
As in Racine's soft, rhyming strain,
It died away in measured pain,
And Hope then whispered to her heart,
"Rejoice!

"Though not the bard of whom thou art
most proud,
Nor of his favoured land—yet mark you crowd,
Absorbed in sympathetic woes;
Each stealthy tear a tribute flows
To the Melpomene!"
She looked—and as the Audience rose,
It dried its eyes,
And wondered why
It had not English Tragedy
Then stood the banished Muse, and smoothed her brow of care,
"And Hope, enchanted, smiled, and waved her golden hair."

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

Mr. Westland Marston is a bold author. Just at the period when the playgoing world is beginning to entertain different notions respecting "legitimacy," to those which it has been accustomed traditionally to receive—when audiences are gradually ceasing to sympathise with pseudo-Elizabethan personages and phrases, and look for interesting plots or situations, in new plays, and some reflections of the manners or ruling passions of our age—when something more than smooth blank verse and elaborate peerings is expected to constitute a successful and attractive play, the author of "The Heart and the World," produced at the above houseon Wednesday evening, comes forward with his five acts, the only ingenuity about which, appears to have been exerted in making them a vehicle for all those strange inconsistencies and faults to which the "realism" of the present day aim their sharpest shafts at. The story is utterly incomprehensible; the characters speak sometimes in poetry and sometimes in prose—now in the stilted phraseology by supposed conventionally to belong to the close of the seventeenth century, and now in the drawing-room parlance of the present day every attempt to interest the spectator in the fortunes of the dramatis personæ has been studiously kept down; and the result is, that after yawning at some scenes, and straining their brains to discover the motives or meaning of others, the audience say at last when the curtain falls, "thank heaven it's over," and some more breathe freely again. We do not, however, wish to deny the evidences of great poetic genius throughout the play. There were passages of exceeding beauty, which were readily seized on by the audience, and warmly complimented; we might also add that this same audience, sometimes carried away by sound rather than meaning, applauded speeches which were not intelligible even after reading them over two or three times in the book. But something more than fine only part of the piece, and admirably she played it her exquisite reading of a letter at the end of the first act, and impassioned acting towards the close of the third, bringing down the drop, in either case, amidst loud plaudits. Few of the other characters appeared at home in their parts. Mr. Brindal, the prince of cool sharp valets, was uncomfortable as a baronet; and Mr. Wigan, in a very wonderful wig, looked as if he would have given any money to have become one of his own "foreign gentlemen" again. Mr. Creswick played effectively, but we cannot say what interpretation he gave of the part, not precisely knowing what was intended; and Miss Julia Bennett looked as well that the audience turned their attention from her character to her individual self, and were well pleased.

The applause at the conclusion was not altogether unqualified; but the principal artistes had to appear; and Mr. Marston, upon being loudly called for, bowed from his private box. The play was then announced for representation every evening of Miss Fancit's engagemen , which, being ended, we do not suppose "The Heart and the World" will be again performed, albeit, from its reception, on Wednesday evening, it will be called successful.

After the play was represented the new farce, produced last Saturday, called "Who's my Husband?" from the pen of Mr. Morton. It has been written for the purpose of placing Keeley as Mr. Daniel Tooles, an apothecary's assistant, in a series of those terrible embarrassments, in which, perplexed, bewildered, and bullied, he is so inimitably comical. He is missed on the very morning of his wedding-day with his master's daughter; his honour is compromised by his presumed intimacy with a supposed widow, to whom he has to pay a certain mysterious sum monthly; in despair, he ultimately avows his affection for her; and Mrs. W. Clifford being the widow to whom Mr. Keeley pretends to be attached, the fun may be imagined. We heard the piece was written for Mr. Buckstone, which we can very well imagine; but it lost none of its humour by being in the hands of Mr. Keeley. Without either of these performers, it might not have met with a good reception. As it was, however, the applause was loud and general, and Mr. Keeley announced it for repetition every evening amidst renewed acclamation.

LYCEUM.

Long before the appointed time for opening the doors on Monday evening, the crowds collected at the Box entrance and in the Strand, showed the interest felt by the play-going world in the new management of this theatre, now undertaken by Madame Vestris.

We have said the crowd was very great on Monday, and the house filled to the slips immediately after the opening of the doors. When the lights were turned up, a simultaneous burst of applause, proceeding from every part of the theatre, acknowledged the extreme beauty of the coup d'œil, and this continued for several minutes, until the overture commenced. In the first piece, all the old favourites were loudly cheered as they came on the stage; and when Madame Vestris herself appeared, there was such a huzzaing, and waving of hats and handkerchiefs, as was only equalled by Mrs. Nisbett's reception on her return to the Haymarket. She looks thinner than when we last saw her, and was suffering from a severe cold. She played with all her old delicacy and grace. The piece, "The Pride of the Market," is an adaptation by Mr. Planché, of a French comedietta, "La Bouquetière du Marché des Innocens." Its story is one of those intrigues of which the memoirs pertaining to the reign of Louis XIV. furnish countless examples, and has all the neatness and ingenuity of the French school, although, possibly, too flimsy for three acts. But Mr. Planché's dialogue runs so easily and pleasantly, that the slender story is forgotten; and Mr. Buckstone's drolleries, as a jealous baker, are so very piquant, in the third act more especially, that the laughter of the audience might possibly interfere with a stronger interest. The piece, which was entirely successful, served to introduce a Miss Gilbert to the London boards. She is a very ladylike and graceful person, and will be an acquisition to the theatre as the "walking lady." The second piece, "The Light Dragoons," met with a very doubtful reception, although Mr. C. Mathews worked like a horse all the way through it, to "pull it up." It might with advantage have been brought into one very short act, and this we still recommend. It was stated, we should observe, that in consequence of the occupation of the stage up to Monday morning by the carpenters and decorators, neither of the new pieces had had a chance of perfect rehearsal.

And now a word about the management of the theatre. Madame Vestris has an admirable company experienced and clever persons in every department, and, beyond all doubt, the favour of the public. With a few good pieces, her success will be brilliant and unchallenged. But we would suggest, for the best part, light one act sketches of modern life, taken in good society—pieces of the class which made the Olympic what it was in the olden times, and first gave birth to that taste for correctness in the mise en scene, which was carried out so well in the succeeding Vestris dynasty at Covent Garden, and more or less followed at all the theatres. Let the new lessees eschew all French translations, except those of the merest bluettes to sparkle for twenty minutes or half an hour—but no longer—between the other pieces. The want of an elegant vaudeville theatre, such as we are told the Lyceum is now to be, has been long felt. Judgment and activity will make it both the fashionable and popular resort of play-going London.

MADAME VESTRIS AS "MARION," IN THE "PRIDE OF THE MARKET."

REDECORATION OF THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

THE Auditory of the Lyceum Theatre, as originally constructed by Mr. S. Beazley, the architect, in 1834, was allowed to be one of the most elegant and novel interiors in the metropolis. The introduction of the tall columns, which are carried up to the line of the second box circle and gallery row, so as to supersede the use of slender pillar supports for each circle, were much admired in the design. Another novelty, the latticed balcony in front of the dress circle, was, however, less popular; and the crimson and gold imitative tapestry on the box fronts was no great matter of art. Still, the interior, taken as a whole, was the most original specimen of theatre decoration in London. As its splendour waned, several injudicious alterations were made in the design; and, through a series of unsuccessful managements, the result of parsimonious neglect was but too apparent. Even during the money-making dynasty of the Keeleys few attempts were made to redeem the artistical character of the Auditory; and, at the close of this management, the theatre required cleansing, from the portico in Wellington-street to the stage wall in Burleigh-street. To this arduous task the present lessee has proved himself fully competent; whilst the presiding taste of Madame Vestris, and the design of Mr. Bradwell (of the Colosseum), have, within the short space of three weeks, given to the Auditory the appearance of a new theatre.

We will now glance at the principal changes; the general effect of which is conveyed in the accompanying large Illustration.

The central chandelier has been removed, and in its place has been painted the figure of Genius, surrounded by a bordure of fruit. Around this are flying Cupids, bearing wreaths, within a circular bordure of flowers, between gilt bands. The lower and principal portion of the ceiling, throughout, is occupied by figures of the Muses, the Seasons, and mythological groups, cleverly designed and painted; and again inclosed by a bordure of flowers within bands. This is, altogether, a great improvement upon the medallic embarassery of the original ceiling decoration: it is, also, more elegantly characteristic of the present style of performances.

The members of the cornice, from which springs the coved ceiling, are very fully gilt; and below is a frieze of rich Italian foliage, with mask-centres, and birds in high relief, taking the appearance of white china, as do all the applied ornaments throughout the house, etch-gilt on a rose-coloured ground. "The columns which support the gallery remain as they were, and are gilt, but the gallery front is entirely changed; the imitative balustrade has disappeared; and, in its stead, are panels, showing clusters of fruit and flowers, painted on a white ground. On the cornice from which the front rises are nine groups of sitting boys, entwined with foliage, holding branches for lights, and producing a play of outline novel and effective. The frieze here also is filled with rich foliage, as above; but on a blue ground, and altered in character by the introduction of birds in high relief, which, apparently, hold up in their bills, by strings of eggs, the drapery of the boxes beneath."

"The first tier of boxes shows an entirely different treatment. On the face of each of the columns at this level, encrusting them, as it were, is a well-arranged group of three boys, associated with foliage, and terminating in a bracket, from which hangs a chandelier. The canopy of what was the balcony is removed, and on the front of the boxes, midway between each column, are groups of boys, in relief, representing music, war, hunting, surrounded by ornamental frames, and made (like the light-bearing boys and friezes above, as before mentioned) to represent white china sparingly gilt. In intervening spaces, are oval medallions containing birds and squirrels, with twinings of holly, oak, and laurel. These are surrounded by borders of flowers, and birds are introduced between them, to hold up the drapery of the dress-circle as above.

"The front of the dress circle is new, and is made to swell out for the feet, as at the Italian Opera House. The decoration here consists of a rich scroll of china flowers, heightened with gold, on a rose-coloured ground.

"The draperies are all of India crimson damask, with gold fringe, and present, in addition to the device of looping them up by the birds, an ingenious departure from the usual arrangement in respect of the private boxes. Fearing the heaviness that might result from the superabundance of the crimson drapery in this particular part of the house, Mr. Bradwell—by whom, as we ought to have said before, the whole of these decorations have been arranged and carried out—has omitted it in the smaller sub-divisions, and introduced Swiss white curtains to each box, as a separation."

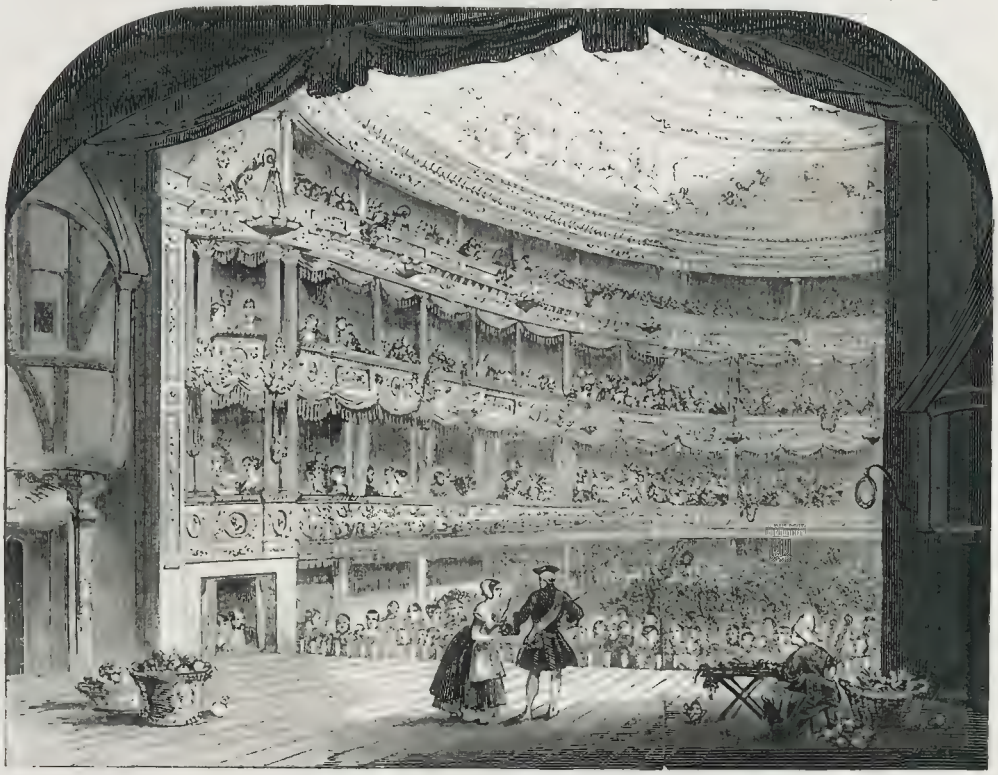
The proscenium was originally, to our thinking, the least successful portion of the original embellishment: it was poor, mean, and ineffective. In place of the painted Royal Arms, in little, they are now in white china, heightened with gold, on a rose-coloured ground, bordered with blue (to connect it in tone with the slips and gallery fronts); and, with an extension of beautifully-modeled foliage, the Arms now occupy the whole of the upper part of the proscenium.

"In the angles, reaching from the front of the slips to the corners of the ceiling, are rays of gold mouldings, with drops of painted flowers between them. The soffit around the opening to the stage and the pilasters beneath, have china ornaments on a blue ground. The proscenium boxes on the dress tier have groups of boys in relief."

These quoted details are from our artistic contemporary the Builder; and we agree with the remark that great ingenuity has been displayed in obtaining a nice play of light and shade, by the breaking up the monotonous horizontal lines.

We have omitted to mention that the two pavilions at the proscenium extremities of the slips have been removed: they were doomed by a small wit long since, and were unsightly excrescences. The body of the house is lighted by sixteen richly-gilt chandeliers of gas in ground glass shades.

Nothing can exceed the gorgeous beauty of the general decorations



INTERIOR OF THE LYCEUM THEATRE, REDECORATED.

SCENE FROM THE "PRIDE OF THE MARKET," AT THE LYCEUM THEATRE.

They are made of a new substance, called carton pierre, which is capable of being sharply cast in moulds; and, being varnished, some have the appearance of porcelain. Messrs. Jackson, of Rathbone-place, are the artists: we noticed, some time since, a fine specimen of their work, in the re-decoration of Ironmongers' Hall.

NEW HELMET.

THE pattern of this new Helmet for the Heavy Dragoons has just been sanctioned by the proper authorities, and will come into use at the customary period for renewing the clothing. It will be seen that the Helmet, in form, resembles that worn by the Life Guards; but the material is of brass, with a black horse-hair plume. The Helmets are now in course of manufacture by Messrs. Hamburger and Co., of King-street, Covent Garden.

NEW HELMET FOR THE HEAVY DRAGOONS.

By the way, the use of the Helmet is of high antiquity: indeed, some covering of this description for the head appears to have been worn by the warriors of every country. Helmets were even found among the inhabitants of the South Sea Islands, when discovered by Captain Cook. Amongst the oldest specimens now remaining are the two helmets found on the field of Cannæ in 1752, preserved in Sir William Hamilton's collection in the British Museum. Another ancient helmet, bearing an inscription, found at Olympia, was presented to the British Museum by King George the Fourth.

PRICES OF CONSOLS.—In the year 1737, Three per Cent. Consols obtained the price of 107 per cent, which was the highest ever known; and on the 20th of September, 1797, when the failure of the attempt to negociate with the French Republic became known, they fell to 47¾, the lowest point they ever reached.

COLLISION OF THE "VANGUARD" AND "MINERVA" STEAMERS.—On the night of yesterday week, the Vanguard left Greenock, having on board about twenty cabin passengers. The weather was exceedingly calm and clear. When off Corsewall Point, about eleven o'clock, the passengers being mostly in bed, a frightful crash was heard, and it was soon found that the vessel had come into collision with the steamer Minerva, from Dublin to Glasgow. The scene at this time was terrific. The captain and crew, not being aware of the extent of the danger, could not allay the fears of the passengers, who were rushing half-dressed on deck: and a portion of both crew and passengers were clinging with eager grasp to the boats. In a short time, however, the fears of the passengers were somewhat calmed, by the assurance of the captain that, although at the time of the collision they were placed in a very perilous position, yet, from an inspection made of the damage, he was quite satisfied that there was no danger, but that he nevertheless considered it prudent to put back to Greenock. Both vessels are lying there, in a very shattered condition.

THE SOLAR ECLIPSE AS SEEN AT WHITEHAVEN.

THE large Eclipse of the Sun, looked forward to with so much interest by astronomers, took place at the exact time predicted, on Saturday morning, the 9th of October. The Eclipse, however, being only a large partial one at this place, presented no new feature for the astronomer to record. The writer, having planted his telescope on the highest ground in this vicinity, obtained a full view of the solar disc at 6h. 33m. A.M., Whitehaven mean time, when the southern limb cleared the summit of Herdhouse, one of the Ennerdale mountains. The first contact of limbs was calculated to take place here at 6h. 4m., or 14 minutes before the time of the Sun's rising, but, in reality, 29 minutes had elapsed from the moment of contact, before the luminary was visible at the most elevated and advantageous position in the neighbourhood of Whitehaven. The Moon had consequently encroached considerably on the Sun's northern limb, when the latter made its appearance, and it continued gradually to cut away the bright body of the Sun until 7h. 15m., when the orb of day presented a fine crescent to the eye, resembling the Moon when about three days old. The Sun, through the telescope, now appeared for a time to repose on his back, with his sharply defined cusps presented vertically upwards; the period of greatest obscuration had arrived—in a minute or so, the crescent had sensibly augmented, and it continued to increase till 8h. 33m., when the Sun again appeared with a full round orb, the shadow passing off on the south eastern limb. There were fewer spots than usual on the Sun, and none of them of any considerable size—all I noticed, were half a dozen in the S.W. portion of the disc, and I found them of considerable value in enabling me to ascertain the moment of greatest obscuration,—it was, moreover, interesting to observe the dark body of the Moon gradually cutting away these maculæ, one after another. I give below the times of occultation of three spots, in case any other observer should have noted their disappearance—though, without the accompaniment of a diagram, I fear the observations will be of little value.

THE EXPLOSION OF GAS IN WALSALL CHURCH.

THE Illustration, from a Sketch by a Correspondent, shows the scene of the terrific catastrophe, described in our Journal of last week.

A large quantity of gas, it appears, had accumulated under the flooring, and perhaps in the vaults of the Parish Church. Nearly the whole of the pews in the south aisle were instantaneously destroyed. The floor and ceiling of the Church are much damaged. The explosion was caused by the thoughtless conduct of one of the beadles, whose attention had been drawn by the Churchwarden to a leakage in one of the pipes, taking a lighted candle, after the service, to discover the cause of the unpleasant smell of the escaping gas, which had been complained of by many parties.

It is a matter for great thankfulness that this fearful accident did not occur till a few minutes after the service. If it had happened but a short time before, the lives of many hundreds must have fallen a sacrifice.

The accompanying Sketch is by a gentleman whose relative narrowly escaped with his life. The poor beadle, the unhappy cause of this calamity, was found dead near to the place where he was last seen with a candle. Several persons were in the Church at the time; but, being at some distance from the immediate spot, have providentially escaped injury. The sound of the report was heard three miles distant.

WALSALL CHURCH, AFTER THE LATE GAS EXPLOSION.

GREAT LOSS OF LIFE IN HUNGARY.—An accident recently took place at Koman, in Hungary, which was attended with a lamentable loss of life. As the Archduke Stephen, on his journey from Vienna to Ofen, was going from Koman to Raab, and about to cross the flying bridge over the Danube, an immense number of people rushed towards the vessel, being anxious to get over, as the town of Raab was brilliantly illuminated, and grand preparations had been made for the Stadtholder. The travelling carriage of the Archduke just succeeded in reaching the vessel, but the bridge immediately gave way; the second and third carriages, and an immense number of persons, were precipitated into the river. The most fearful confusion ensued. About 80 persons were missing, among whom were many cavaliers from the suite of the Archduke; but it is hoped that many of them may have been saved. A later account states that above 200 persons were precipitated into the river, among whom were many nobles, and, as far as can be ascertained, 40 persons were drowned. Many bodies have already been washed on shore. The Archduke Stephen has testified the most lively interest in the mournful event.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday). Notwithstanding the arrivals of English wheat during the present week have been on a very moderate scale the show of samples here this morning was more than equal to the wants of the millers, whose attendance was again small. For all descriptions—especially for the parcs a left over from Monday—the demand was in a very sluggish state, and, in some instances the quotations of the previous day have been reduced. Moderate imports of foreign wheat have been received, nevertheless, owing to several large parcels being pressed for sale. In malt trade was heavy, and Monday's currencies were with difficulty supported. Barley was a very slow sale, and somewhat easier to purchase. Superfine malt supported late rates, but all other kinds were very dull, at barely stationary prices. Oats were a slow inquiry, but not cheaper. In all other articles we have no change to notice

The Seed Markets.—There has been a slight improvement in the demand for clover seed, at very full prices. Canary has advanced 2s per quarter. All other kinds of seeds move off slowly, at late rates. Linseed cakes are steady; but rapeseed cakes are cheaper.

Linseed, English, sowing, 60s to 63s. Baltic, crushing, 42s to 43s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 37s to 39s. Hempseed, 36s to 38s per quarter. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 8s to 9s; white ditto, 7s to 7s 6d.

Tea.—For all kinds of tea, the supply of which pressing for sale is extensive, we have to report a very dull inquiry, at barely stationary prices

Sugar.—A somewhat extensive amount of business has been transacted in raw sugars during the week, and prices have been mostly supported. Refined goods are heavy, and 6d per cwt. cheaper. Brown lumps, 43s to 52s 6d; a standard ditto, 53s per cwt.

Coffee.—This market still rules very dull, and, to effect large sales, lower prices must be submitted to Rice.—The fall in the quotations of corn has had considerable influence upon the demand for rice, which is heavy, on lower terms.

Provisions.—The arrivals of Irish butter being on a very extensive scale, the trade is heavy, at a further reduction in the quotations of 1s per cwt. Carlow, landed, 92s to 98s; Cornish, 80s to 86s. Kilkenny, 90s to 96s; Cork, 90s to 94s; Limerick, 88s to 94s; and Waterford, 90s to 96s per cwt. On board, or for forward delivery, we have no sales to report. A fair business is doing in English butter at 104s for mild and 96s for middling, per cwt. Fine is in demand and good ditto: 100s to 104s for the Devon; and 92s 6d to 98s per dozen lbs. for fresh Welch Dutch butter we are nominally quoted unchanged. Fine Friesland, 104s to 108s; Holland, 100s to 104s, middling and good, 90s to 96s; and inferior qualities, 78s to 88s per cwt. The arrivals of new Irish bacon are considerably on the increase, prices have fallen 2s per cwt. Prime sizeable Waterford, 76s to 78s. Old parcels are unsaleable, at 60s to 66s per cwt. Prime lard is quite a shade. All other kinds move off slowly, at about sticklemoney.

Tallow.—Owing to the large arrivals, the heavy stock, and the scarcity of money, the market is heavy, at drooping prices. P Y C on the spot, is 44s 6d; and for delivery all the year, 43s 6d to 44s per cwt. Home make is 47s 3d to 48s 6d per cwt.

Oils.—We have had a very dull sale for all kinds of oil, and prices have a downward tendency.

Spirits.—The rum market is heavy, at a further reduction in value of from 1d to 2d per gallon. Jamaica, 23 to 26 per cent overproof, is selling at 8s 6d to 9s. Demerara, 12 to 26 per cent, 2s 1d to 2s 3d; Leewards, 1s 10d; and Calcutta, 1s 9d per proof gallon. Brandy is very dull and rather cheaper. In corn spirits no alteration.

Potatoes.—The arrivals of potatoes at the water-side are good, and of excellent quality. The trade is dull by means active, at offers very low, from 70s to 110s per ton.

Hops (Friday).—The tightness in the Money Market still continues to act very prejudicially to the hop trade, whilst in a measure depressing the duties that have had to report for a series of years past at this particular season; consequently prices rule extremely low On speculation no sales have taken place this week, but for immediate use—the brewers purchasing with extreme caution—the transactions have been somewhat extensive, at barely former rates; the quotations have again receded from 2s to 3s per cwt. Yearling and old hops may be had at miserably low figures. The duty is called 140,000 cwt. Bassez prokes, £3 3s to £3 6s; Wealds of Kent, ditto, £3 10s to £4 0s; Mid and East Kent, ditto, £4 to to £5 10s

Smithfield (Friday).—Owing to the supply of barely stock was moderate as to number 2,—there being about 200 head less on offer than on this day se nnight—and of very inferior quality Really prime beasts would have sold at full prices, whereof there were but a few, all there were none in the market, we have to report a steady beef trade, at fully Monday's quotations. The foreign supply for London consisted of 220 oxen and cows, 1700 sheep and lambs, and 12 pigs. With sheep, we were very scantily supplied. All breeds moved off readily, at fully, but at nothing quotable beyond Monday's currencies. There was a very moderate show of calves, and a good clearance was effected, at, in some instances, an advance in the currencies of 2d per 8lb. The pork trade was firm, at late rates. Milch cows were very dull, at from £15 to £17 17s each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb. to sink the offal—

Inferior beef, 2s 6d to 2s 8d; middling ditto, 2s 10d to 3s; prime large ditto, 3s 2d to 3s 4d; prime small ditto, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; large pork, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; inferior mutton, 3s 6d to 3s 8d; middling ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 0d; prime ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; veal, 3s 8d to 4s 8d; small pork, 4s 10d to 5s 4d.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

At present there is no abatement of anxiety in monetary circles. Each day discloses some new example of over trading, upon the insecure prospect of assistance whenever required. The balance-sheets of the week have only served to swell the forbearance of creditors, exhibit sad proofs to the foreigner of the reckle sness in which the once-renowned English merchant has of late indulged. To the lists of previous weeks may now be added the suspension of the Royal Bank of Liverpool, and the Liverpool Banking Company. In the first case most reckless advances have been made and in supporting speculations directly opposed to fair trading, and the money of the shareholders has been unprofitably wasted, although large dividends have been annually declared. The original capital was £500,000, which was afterwards increased by the creation of 2000 new shares of £1100 each, of which £50 per share has been called up. Such an amount, with an addition of £ 10,000 deposits, carefully employed, might have not only assisted legitimate trade, but have paid a fair dividend to the proprietary. Unsecured advances, however, to an unprecedented amount, furnishing a clue that too clearly explains the withholding, and consequent undue advance of produce, have dissipated a large proportion of this princely capital. The case of the Liverpool Banking Company is less important in its effects, the business having been more limited, and apparently better conducted. This case, however, is not free from deserved censure. Several firms in Liverpool are known to be in both the cities; and two Banking Companies are viewed with suspicion. A large Bank in the Country in the North, it is understood, will su-pend. The Directors at the Bank of England are pressed, on Tuesday, to a demand for an advance by a large firm connected with the Royal Bank of Liverpool.

Notwithstanding this augmentation of difficulties, much satisfaction is expressed by the great body of the respectable merchants, at the relief afforded to the Liverpool Deputation by the Government. Over-trading, aided by imprudent advances of the Banking Companies, is felt to be the primary cause of the existing state of things, while that the Government system has been added, "to make assurance sure," is a most insolvency would be only postponing the evil, to increase it at a future day This is understood to be the feeling of the Directors of the Bank of England, who, when consulted by the Government, refused to be any party to an extension of the currency, preferring to let affairs take their course, rather than give an appearance of deceitful stability to firms rotten to the very core.

A meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Lyall, Brothers and Company, was held on Saturday last, when the balance-sheet exhibited a deficiency of £188,881, and a dividend of about 9s. in the pound. A claim, however, on the estate of Messrs. Lyall, Matheson, and Co., amounting to £200,000, is only set down at £60,000. Should the larger amount be paid, a dividend of 17s. may be realised.

On Monday, the balance-sheet of Messrs Castelain, Sons, and Co., was exhibited to the creditors. A deficiency of £36,000, and a probable dividend of 10s. in the £ was the result. A meeting of the creditors of Messrs Cockerell and Co. was held on the same day, and a nominal surplus of £190,000 was shown. An understanding was agreed to that a dividend of 5s. in the £ should be immediately liquidated, and general dividends be made from time to time, as often as sufficient funds may be in hand to distribute 10 per cent. The creditors of Messrs. Thomas, Son, and Lafevre, met on Tuesday. The property is ample to meet demands upon the contingencies of Messrs. De Jersey and Company paying in full, and the house in St. Petersburgh meeting its engagements. These two facts accomplished, and a surplus of £40,213 will remain. On Wednesday the creditors of Messrs Perkins, Schlusser, and Mullens, held a meeting. The balance-sheet displayed a surplus (after deducting estimated losses) of £8,721. The liabilities on bills receivable, however, are very large. Payments are to be made in the manner in which they are liquidated.

The English Market opened on Monday with much buoyancy at a rise of ¼ per cent., 81 ¼ being the quotation for Money. The failure of the Royal Bank of Liverpool, however, speedily reduced quotations, and the price at the close of business was 79¾ to ¾. On Tuesday the fluctuations were frequent and extensive, Consols opening at 79¾ for Money, and receding to 78¾. They rally afterwards made a quotation of 80¾, but the stoppage of the Liverpool Banking Company depressed prices to 79¾. Money was, however, in less demand, 6 per cent. being the average rate. More steadiness was apparent on Wednesday. Consols, after touching 79¾, closed at 79¾ to 80. A further improvement at the opening on Thursday to 79¾ to 80¾, was followed by 80¾ for Money. Towards the close, however, the Bank threw a large sum of stock on the market, in order to assist a Liverpool house, and prices immediately fell ¼ per cent. Exchequer Bills have been done as low as 34s discount, but have rallied, and varied with Consols. India Bonds are very heavy, and Bank Stock is now very depressed; at closing, the prices were, for Bank Stock, 181; Reduced, 79; Consols, 79¾; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. 80¼; Long Annuities, 8 1-16; Ditto Thirty Years, 8¾; India Bonds, under £1000, 40s; Consols for Account, 80¾; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 24 d.; £500, 17 dis.; Small, 2 pm.

A very unimportant in Spanish and Mexican occurred on Monday, with which exception the market was flat. Mexican was 17¼; Spanish Actives, 17¾. This rate received on Tuesday to 16¾. On Wednesday, 17¼ was "called: Mexican, on the contrary, receded to 16¾. No movement was apparent, a consequence of the Spanish news on Wednesday, and since that period no alteration has taken place of moment The last rates are—for Brazilian Bonds, 70; Danish Bonds, 79¾; Equador Bonds, 24¼; Grenada Bonds, Deferred, 3; Mexican, 18; Portuguese 5 per Cents, 74; Ditto 4 per Cent, 20; Spanish 5 per Cent, 1840, 17¼; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent, 53¼; Ditto 4 per Cent, 89¾

The Share Market continues extremely dull, as the following list will show: Bristol and Exeter, 63; Caledonian, 34¼; Do., Half Shares, ¼; Eastern Counties, 15¾; Do., Perpetual, 5 per Cent., No. 1, ¼ dis; Do., do., No. 2, ¼ dis; York Extension, 7¾; Great Northern, 14¼; Great North of England, 21¼; Great Western, 90; Do., Half Shares, 52¼; Do., Quarter Shares, 14; Do., Fifths, 2¼; Do., New £17, 6¾; Lancashire and Yorkshire, Fifths, 8¾; Do., Thirds (Rag) 6¾; Leeds and Bradford, 84; London, Brighton, and South Coast, —; Ditto, Guarant. 5 per Cent., 108; London and North Western, 143; Ditto, Quarters, L. and B., 2⅝; Do., New, 6¾; Do., Fifths, 10¾, Do. £10 (M & B.), A. 7; London and South Western, 54¾; Ditto New Cons., Fifths, 40; Ditto, Set £50, 26¾; Midland, 10¾; Do. £40 Shares, 39; Do. £50 Shares, 6¾; North Britain, —; Do., Half Shares, 10¾; Ditto, Quarters, 3¾; Do. SATURDAY MORNING.—The "Banking Company in the North," alluded t above, is the Newcastle, Shields, and Sunderland Joint Stock Bank. The late town agents, Messrs. Barnetts, and Co., have not suffered, the London and Westminster Bank having been for some time engaged in conducting the agency. In the English Market Consols advanced 80¾ but at closing they had receded to 79¾ for Money, and 80¼ for Account. Exchequer Bills were 24 to 22 dis. for large bills, and 18 for £500 bills, par to 3 for small. In the Foreign and Share Markets nothing of any moment occurred.

THE MONETARY CURRENCY.—BY JOHN HOLLAND.

We have received a Pamphlet entitled as above, which contains some clear remarks respecting the Currency, the subject which now most agitates the commercial world.

Mr. Holland states that his must never be forgotten that if we make Paper Money as valuable as Gold, we virtually make Gold as plentiful as Paper Money;" and he wishes to prove that the only safe Currency consists of Gold and Silver, exclusively of all Paper. We quote from page 9 the following:

Our old commercial friend Roberts, when about to describe the internal resources of England, in the time of Elizabeth, says, "the ornaments of this country hath, in times past, been expressed unto us by this verse:—

England is stor'd with mountains, bridges, wood,
With towns, with corn, with pasture, and with flood."

"But these are not the commodities that merchants look after." He then commences to enumerate the various articles of manufacture, such as was then exported to every part of the known world

"By manufacture, England yields woollen cloths of all sorts, broad and narrow, a quarter of a million (by computation) of pieces. Wool, it must be borne in mind, was the staple commodity of the kingdom: the manufactures were spread over the kingdom in (what may be termed) natural localities, arising from the facilities that three hundred and twenty-five rivers, and eight hundred and fifty-seven bridges would afford. He then mentions twenty other Lighter materials for clothing; there were eight hundred furnaces daily set on work, iron of all sorts, besides ordnance of iron, salt, coal, lead, alum, copperas, all iron wares, linen, cloth, glass and glasses of all sorts, leather, silver, gunpowder, all sorts of saltpetre, and all sorts of grain and farming products, and wheat in great plenty. He then goes on to show that England wanted neither gentry nor parks, clergy nor churches; she had an abundance of all; but I will give his own words:—"The beauty and wealth of this kingdom is demonstrated in 336 rivers, eight thereof being great and navigable for some miles, whereon is found 887 bridges; 30 chases; 55 forests; 74 parks; 800 archdeaconries; 844 deaneries; 844 parsonages; 9400 parochial benefices, besides impropriations and vicarages, and the whole divided into six circuits, for the administration of justice; 22 bishoprics; 2 archbishoprics; 40 shires; 45 counties; 5627 parishes, and 800 market towns, which are market-towns; and 22 cities, including the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge."

"Thus have we seen the beauty and wealth of England, fifty-six years before Paper Money was invented in this kingdom, and which had been progressing for a thousand years preceding that time, in a natural manner, according as population increased. We proceed to show that Debt is a much subsequent event years of the time of the invention of Paper Money in this kingdom; the labourers last are shillings a week, bread was threepence a quartern, and they could buy twenty-four quartern loaves for a pound of their money. St. Paul's Cathedral was building about this time, and cost one million sterling.

It is all very well for Mr. Holland to wish us to return to a pure Metallic Currency; but what would he do with our enormous Debt, which in reality would be doubled in amount by the exclusive Metallic medium in contemplation? The interest of the Debt is now paid by the industry of this country, and amounts in fact to giving to the fundholder as many hundred thousand quarters of wheat, thousands of yards of cloth, &c. Suppose we increase the value of money by withdrawing the Paper, the labourers would have to work double the time to obtain the same amount the money paid as interest by a pure Metallic Currency would purchase double the quantity of labour or produce in a Mixed Currency, as at present. And, besides, most of the private debts have been contracted in a very different Currency from a Metallic one.

We are certain the Pamphlet will not have much effect in stemming the current now set in in favour of an increase of Paper Money; we believe the agitation will be such as to induce the Government to propose something to alleviate the present distress, and we think they ought to do so; but, however, caution the mercantile world against asking for too large a quantity of Paper Money. This would produce greater panics than even the present.

IRELAND.

THE REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The usual meeting of this body was held on Monday, at Conciliation Hall. Mr. Steele presided. Mr. Gray, one of the members of the Legislature were present. The principal matter brought under the notice of the Association was a report from the Committee on the distress of Ireland, and its remedy. Mr. J. O'Connell, in this document, which was drawn up by him, refers to various proofs of the existence of great destitution. He refers to the official admissions of the same facts. He demands £12,000,000 additional from the Imperial Treasury, for the alleviation of this destitution and the preservation of the lives of the people. The report insists that England can find no difficulty in an advance of this amount, for she expended, in 1813, upon a useless war, £162,000,000 and in 1815 in the prosecution of that mischievous war, £174,000,000. The report passed the Association with much applause.—Mr. O'Connell referred at much length to the approaching meeting of the Roman Catholic Bishops.—Mr. Scully, M.P., stated the painful fact that Government had forwarded to the west of Ireland already 1200 tons of meal. The rent for the week was £37 3s. 9d.

SEARCH OF ARMS.—It appears from the Irish papers that the most active measures have been taken by the Government to suppress the spirit of tumult and outrage prevailing in the southern part of the county of Limerick. A large reinforcement of troops has been sent there, and the Roman Catholic Bishops have had a meeting upon the subject, respecting which the Evening Freeman says: "There was but one opinion as to the present condition and future prospects of the country. The prelates lament, in earnest, and sound, and east, as well as the prelates from the west, fully knowing the circumstances of their respective provinces, bore testimony to the fearful privations which the people at present labour under, and the fearful prospect of famine that is before them. The result of this day's conference has been the UNANIMOUS ADOPTION of a resolution to petition the Government for the immediate adoption of measures for prompt and efficient relief."

SUSPENSION OF RAILWAY CALLS.—On Wednesday the deputation appointed at a meeting of shareholders in the Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Junction Railway, lately held in Manchester, for the purpose, waited on the Board by appointment. The proceedings on the part of the shareholders' deputation resolved themselves into three questions:—First, whether the directors were disposed, in the present state of the money market, to call for the whole of the £5 per share; secondly, whether they were disposed to return any portion of the £98,000 now in hand, and wait for more favourable times; and, thirdly, if not disposed to do either, what they really were disposed to do? The directors replied, that after mature consideration, they found that they could not do the first without a new Act; that their legal advisers informed them that to do the second would be illegal; and, as regarded any notice of the third question, they might state that they were perfectly aware of the condition of the Money Market, that they would do all they could to suspend works and curtail expenditure, that they had let no contracts and had suspended many works already, and that it was not their intention to suspend all operations, in so far as was consistent with their engagements. The Liverpool, Manchester, and Newcastle Company is about the first railway that has publicly moved in this matter, and its example is expected to form a precedent that will be pretty generally followed. The total deposits received amounted to £179,000, and the total expenditure to about £80,000, leaving a present balance of about £98,970. Nothing beyond the finishing of the surveys and plans for the portion of the line from Kettlewell to Bolton Castle, fifteen miles, which it was intended first to commence out of a total of sixty, and which includes a summit tunnel, has been done, and this only has been wicked out. The line is to a great extent in alliance with the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

the water. Breaking suddenly on the view, "the Nakki Talao" (as the lake is called) forms a most delightful picture; surrounded as it is by high-peaked and well-wooded hills, on and about which many temples are built, and many snow-white tents are pitched. The eastern extremity of the lake is the one more generally, however, sought after by visitors as a place for their tents, on account of the westerly breezes which are cooled by their passage over the water; and about this spot many small, but pretty and commodious bungalows or cottages have been erected. Although in the vicinity of the lake, the scenery of Aboo is the finest, yet for the seventeen miles in length and eight miles in breadth that the mountain extends, it presents at each step new and striking views; the walks and rides are rich in varied scenes: rock and wood, interspersed with luxuriant valleys, abound in all, and form a never tiring panorama to the eye, weary as it is of the interminable plains of Guzerat.

During the past hot season some sporting gentlemen, by great perseverance, contrived to find a spot where races could be run, and their ingenuity converted one of the few level spots on the hill into a race-course, strange, indeed, in shape, being in the form of a badly constructed figure of 8, but one that answered every purpose. The annexed Sketch will give some idea of the extraordinary form of the course and of the beautiful scenery surrounding it; but a better pen than the writer's is required to describe the gay scenes the spot presented on the days of the races, when nearly every person on the Hill, European and native, was present, the latter portion of the community adding much to its picturesqueness by their white flowing dresses and turbans of many colours. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS

No. 287.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1847. [Sixpence.

THE COMING SESSION.

APPING out the work of the New Parliament is an occupation already commenced; and, if the number of questions to be considered is estimated, its task, as a mere matter of quantity, is immense. There is an anxiety to know how a Legislature, in which there is such a preponderance of new men, will deal with many an old subject; and this feeling, combined with some recent events, creates an impression that Government cannot long defer summoning the House of Commons, "for the dispatch of business."

It is one of the old traditions of Downing Street, that, except under extraordinary circumstances, Parliament can only meet in February; that is the month sacred to bills and motions, as September to partridges, and August to grouse. But the business of the British Empire has become so vast and complicated, that the space of time it usually sits has become too short; as questions have multiplied, so have those who speak on them; a lengthening of the Session, or of the sittings during the Session, has become inevitable; and there is even a prospect of the Legislature extending its meeting through the whole year. But, independently of the pressure of general business, there are special circumstances which make an anticipation of the usual period of assembling, almost unavoidable.

First, that necessity has been precipitated by the virtual suspension of the Bank Charter Act of 1844, which the Cabinet was compelled to carry into effect last week. They were at last forced to abandon that "we can do nothing" policy, on the weakness of which we recently took occasion to remark. We have rarely noted such a want of foresight: there was scarcely a banker or merchant in the City, who did not see the course to be taken three weeks ago; but, wrapped up in official incredulity, the Ministry alone were unprepared; they resisted to the last, as if the suggestions made to them by the commercial community came from enemies, and were to be suspected. How has the flippant confidence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer been rebuked! Compelled to act, he has lost by delay all the credit he might have gained by acting in time; he is in the position of a man on whom perception has been forced: why not have done this before, is the universal question, when it would have saved half the bankruptcies, and much of the ruin that has overtaken us? And in that question the reputation of the Statesman is gone; the possibility of asking it, proves the existence of two faults, ignorance or obstinacy; and by ignorance and obstinacy England cannot be ruled.

But, now the step is taken, it will require to be explained before it is ratified; it at once destroys the infallibility of Sir Robert Peel's Bill, and the whole question of Bank Management is opened again; with it comes the interminable subject of the Currency. The Parliament of 1847 is not the Parliament of 1841; men have changed, circumstances have changed; will the Act of 1844 escape modification, now that it has been broken in upon? The conduct of the Bank itself has not been of the wisest, nor is its constitution such as to create implicit confidence in it. The suffering the commercial world has gone through, has been too great to be lightly forgotten; and the same reasons that compel the Government to call Parliament together at an early period, will give rise, in it, to some strong denunciations of the policy they have thought fit to pursue. For the past week, the meetings of the Cabinet have been frequent, indicating an anxious and uneasy state of feeling. Did Sir Robert Peel consent to this violation of his perfect, self-acting, measure? Supposing he did not consent, will he approve of it, now it is done? There is a chance, just a chance, from the half-hint he let fall at the Liverpool Dinner, that he will not oppose the "mitigation;" in that case, he may float the Ministry over the difficulty; but even Sir Robert Peel's influence in the new Parliament has to be tested.

Ireland forms a large item in the demand on the time of next Session. There is a field in that country for the exertions statesman, such as was never before offered to the ambition—the laudable ambition—of man. A whole society has to be reconstructed; what a problem! But we have little hope that any of our party leaders will be equal to the emergency; boldness and sagacity are what are wanted; but it must not be the sagacity learned from the past; and the courage required must be that which can dispense with precedents. The condition of Ireland resembles nothing on the face of the earth. The Catholic Bishops who formed the late deputation to Lord Clarendon, were quite right in tracing the present evils of the land to the dreadful legislation of the past; but they proposed no tangible remedy for the present, and the world cannot progress with its eyes turned eternally backward; their lament, rather insinuated than expressed, over the disappearance of monasteries, was merely absurd, and we look in vain throughout their long memorial, for any suggestion which common sense would confirm as a good one, except, perhaps, "an equitable arrangement of the relations between landlords and tenants, founded on commutative justice," which is also rather vague. The same vice runs through all these memorials; describing existing evils vividly enough, and recalling the sins of our ancestors with a painful accuracy, they can see no further into the future than those they censure. The reply of Lord Clarendon is stamped with the same defect, though it is the best answer delivered by any recent Lord-Lieutenant to similar representations As to monasteries, they do little but foster and encourage idleness and beggary abroad; in Ireland at the present day, they would be mere public nuisances. A Poor-Law had been passed, which shall and must be completely carried out; the difficulty of applying it is no proof of its failure; and, beyond all, he states decidedly that there are many landlords in Ireland who have not done their duty. In general, when any thing harsh is said of the Irish landlords, it is met by a plea that there are "exceptions;" of course there are, but Society takes its character from the mass, not the exceptions; and in England the character of Irish landlords is decidedly a bad one, in one-half the cases we believe from their total inability to act better if they wished it. For the rest, Lord Clarendon's declaration is not suggestive, it deals too much in "ifs." If everybody was exactly what they ought to be, there would be no occasion for Laws, nor Parliaments, nor Prime Ministers, nor Lord Lieutenants; but, as they are not so, there is occupation for Legislators and Ministries, and authorities of all kinds, to compel better behaviour if compulsion is necessary. To expect and hope that men will change their natures and do their duty, who never did it before, is to be over sanguine; and over confidence is ruin either to statesmen or generals.

Then come all the other minor but still important subjects, that have hitherto been overborne, from the public mind not having been excited to the proper pitch about them. The Health of Towns, the sanatory condition of the people, become of vital consequence to all, by the rumoured approach of pestilence to our shores: even now we do not believe the dwellers in the largest cities, with the most ample means of information about them, are aware of half the horrors that surround them. Enon Chapel has figured again in the public prints during the past week, with the additional enormity that, festering with death below, it is used as a dancing-room, where "balls" are given at sixpence a head! What ideas of religion have the managers of such foul dens? Here alone is a vast field for legislation opened to us! With the new blood that has been infused into the Legislature, we hope the rate of our progress will be increased, and that the next session will see some difficulties turned into possibilities, and impossibilities into facts.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

As we have already detailed the history and machinery of this great monetary Establishment (See No. 102, Vol. IV.), we need only here explain that the prefixed View was sketched during one of the days of the late Monetary Panic, when the scene may be inferred to present its extreme excitement.

It is worthy of note that the occasion of our previous Illustration (April 8th, 1844,) was the extraordinarily high prices of the Funds; now we have to note a very opposite record.

At the above date, for the first time for nearly a century, the Three per Cent. Consols were par, or £100 each for £100 stock. The highest price the Three per Cents. ever rose to was in June, 1737, and again in May, 1739, when they attained £107 In the troublous times of 1797, when our troops were defeated abroad, and rebellion was at home, the Three per Cent. Consols fell to 47½ being the lowest price to which they have ever fallen.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

It transpired towards the close of business on Saturday last, that a deputation of City bankers, consisting of Mr. Masterman, Mr. Abel Smith, Mr. G.yn, Mr. Bevan, Mr. Barnard, and a few others, had waited upon the commercial interests of the country, and that this pressure has been aggravated by a want of that confidence which is necessary for carrying on the ordinary dealings of trade.

"They have been in hope that the check given to transactions of a speculative character, the transfer of capital from other countries, the influx of bullion, and the feeling which a knowledge of these circumstances might have been expected to produce, would have removed the prevailing distrust.

"They were encouraged in this expectation by the speedy cessation of a similar state of feeling in the month of April last.

"These hopes, however, have been disappointed, and her Majesty's Government have come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when they ought to attempt, by some extraordinary and temporary measure, to restore confidence to the mercantile and manufacturing community.

"For this purpose they recommend to the Directors of the Bank of England, in the present emergency, to enlarge the amount of their discounts and advances upon approved security; but that, in order to retain this operation within reasonable limits, a high rate of interest should be charged. In present circumstances they would suggest that that interest should not be less than 8 per cent.

"If this course should lead to any infringement of the existing law, her Majesty's Government will be prepared to propose to Parliament, on its meeting, a bill of indemnity.

"They will rely upon the discretion of the Directors to reduce as soon as possible the amount of their notes, if any extraordinary issues should take place within the limits prescribed by law.

"Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that any extra profit derived from this measure should be carried to the account of the public, but the precise mode of doing so must be left to future arrangement.

"If her Majesty's Government are not insensible to the evil of any departure from the law which has placed the currency of this country upon a sound basis, but they feel confident that, in the present circumstances, the measure which they have proposed may be safely adopted; and that, at the same time, the main provisions of that law and the vital principle of preserving the convertibility of the Bank note may be firmly maintained.

"We have the honour to be, your most obedient servants, (Signed) "JAMES MORRIS, Governor.

BANK RESOLUTION.

"Resolved,—That this Court do accede to the recommendation contained in the letter from the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, dated this day, and addressed to the Governor and Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England, which has been read.

"That the minimum rate of discount on bills not having more than 95 days to run be 8 per cent.

"That advances be made on Bills of Exchange, Stock, Exchequer Bills, and other approved securities, in sums of not less than £2000, and for periods to be fixed by the Governors, at the rate of 8 per cent per annum."

On this resolve being generally circulated, nothing could exceed the agitation that prevailed. Everywhere it became the enerossing subject of conversation; and, while many who were favorable to the "expansion" objected to the high rate of interest, others more experienced, remembering 1825 and 1836, with all the train of evils that resulted upon the withdrawal of the notes then issued, loudly expressed their disapprobation of this invasion of the most valuable chaser in the Bank Charter Bill. Its mere relaxation, it was observed, robs the measure, at once and for ever, of the powerful check to over-trading, that a knowledge that, under no circumstances whatever, a relaxation would be resorted to, was calculated to produce. The immediate effect in Liverpool has been to raise the value of cotton one per cent. This is a direct hindrance to manufacturing, and Manchester, Leeds, &c., consequently suffer. It is remarked at Liverpool that eight per cent, although high, is nothing in comparison with being obliged to withhold goods when ordered, and ultimately by the consumer. From Manchester, advices have been received of the failure of Messrs. Fairbridge, and Mr. Robert Gardner (the latter is greatly regretted); from Leeds, of a firm it would be premature to mention. In the meantime, money in London is rather dearer than cheaper. Discount houses, and the joint stock banks, are taking money repayable at short dates, at 6 per cent, 5 and 6 per cent is charge less than the current rate. Good bills will not be done under 8 per cent; and second-rate at scarcely any price. The Directors of the Bank of England at present have not been subject to any great demands since Monday; the difficulty of offering good security being at once an obstacle to firms partially insolvent. At present it is almost premature to judge, but doubts are entertained whether the benefits resulting, even for the present, from the "relaxation," will at all balance the baneful effects already anticipated

On Monday, the stoppage of the North and South Wales Bank was announced. An unfounded report of the failure on Friday caused a run, which ended in suspension; a resumption, however, is confidently anticipated.

As soon as the correspondence between the Bank of England and the Government was made public the use of money for one and a half per cent immediately ensued. Consols on Saturday left off at 89⅞ to ⅞, and on Monday, 89¾ ⅞. Several fluctuations, however, occurred in the course of the day, and a fall of ¼ per cent, on the announcement by the Bank broke up of the terms of the correspondence alluded to above, excited much surprise On Tuesday, the market was very unsettled, operations being nearly confined to Consols. The opening quotations were 89¾, and the highest quotation 90⅝, with numerous fluctuations. A tendency to reaction was visible on Wednesday; the first price was 89¾ for Money, which declined to 89⅝, but afterwards rallied to 89¾ ⅞, at which prices they closed. On Thursday, there was scarcely any fluctuation until towards the close of business. The news of a banking failure in the West of England caused a fall of nearly ¼ per cent; and at closing, 89⅛ for Money, and 89⅜ ⅜ for Time, were the current quotations. Exchequer Bills have considerably fluctuated during the week; about 70s. dis. for large bills is the closing quotation. Bank Stock has fluctuated, but India Bonds continue very much depressed, quoting about 30s. dis. The closing prices are for Bank Stock, 185; Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities, 81½; Three per Cent. Consols, 89⅜; New Three-and-a-Quarter per Cent. Annuities, 89⅛; Long Annuities, 9 1-16; Ditto 30 Years, 8 11-16; India Stock, 228; India Bonds, £1000, 30 dis.; Consols for Account, 89⅜; Exchequer Bills, £1000, 15 dis., ditto, £500, 17 dis., ditto, Small, 2 p.

In the Foreign Market a general stagnation prevails. Spanish Three per Cents. on Tuesday, were done at 28; Portuguese, 21¼; Mexican, 17½; Dutch Four per Cents., 81½ Mexican declined on Wednesday to 16⅜, and Portuguese, 20⅝. Peru has since slightly reacted, and closed as follows:—Brazilian Bonds, 75½; Ditto, Small, 78; Mexican Five per Cent., 1846, 16¼; Peruvian Bonds, Six per Cents, 25; Portuguese Four per Cents., 21½; Russian Bonds, 105. Spanish Five per Cent., 1840, 16½; Ditto, Passive, 5⅝; Ditto, Three per Cent., 27½; Belgian Four-and-a-Half per Cent., 88; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent., 12 Gmld, 83; Ditto, four per Cent. Certificates, 82

The Railway Market was very animated on Tuesday, prices generally advancing. SATURDAY MORNING. An unsettled feeling pervaded the Stock Exchange yesterday, and Consols gradually declined from 89½ to 89⅜ to 89⅛ for Money, and 89½ for the Account. Exchequer Bills fortnightly vary. Bank Stock on the Shares Market was very depressed. Notwithstanding this heavy appearance of affairs in the Stock Markets, a better feeling existed out of doors The failure of Messrs. Brooke, alluded to above, is likely only to prove a temporary suspension, and in the best circles City information a decided feeling of improvement prevailed.

HELP IN HOUR OF NEED.

THE ADVANCE OF THREE MILLIONS.

"Help in the Hour of Need!"—the cry
Rang from the Merchant's house of Care,
Mid distant wailings to the sky
Of Panic-Parts everywhere!
The fever spread its spectre gaunt
Roar'd onward as a rushing steed,
In vain pale Commerce shriek'd
"Avaunt!"
And wept for "Help in Hour of Need!"

The "Hour of Need," in truth had strode
As on some fearful wing of Time,
And enter'd Trade's unwarn'd abode,
And scared it's spirit like a Crime!
Integrity must bow,
And heart of Honesty must bleed,
Unless the mighty aid us now,
And "help us in the Hour of Need."

Banks, Funds, and Credit—who shall stem
The torrent raging over all?
Dismantled of her diadem,
The once proud Commerce mourns her fall!
Thick and more thick, the evils lower!
Fast and more fast the perils speed!
"Oh, for the giant hand of Power,
To stretch forth 'Help in Hour of Need!'"

The voice of London cries aloud
The old Emporium of the world!—
Not with its lusty lungs, and proud,
But with a haughty banner furl'd!

The sturdy staff of MAMMON reels
And quivers as a shaken reed;
Humbled, the groaning Crœsus kneels,
And prays for "Help in Hour of Need!"

Nor may he fall!—He is a King
No Monarch shall see uncrowned—
His merchants' harvests withering!
His Argosie of Commerce drown'd!
No, Ingot as the Gate of Thames' side
A Merchant-River—'tis decreed
The Palaces that skirt his side
Shall help his sons in hour of need!

So, till St. Stephen's door be flung
Wide to the Legislator's tread,
The Nation's grief-complaint is rung
Loud at the portals of WHITEHALL.
The TREASURY, with the word "RAILS,
Hot-telegraphs'd the BANK will speed,
And QUEEN and Senate as a shaken reed
To help the City's Hour of Need!

THE CHOLERA.—A letter from St. Petersburg, of the 12th, gives the following intelligence relative to the cholera. "Since the 24th of September no new case has been observed in the town of Saratoff. In the rest of the province of that name the disease has diminished considerably from the 15th of that month. At Woronesch also the cholera has lost its intensity. Up to the 21st September, 3556 persons of that town have been attacked, of whom 1437 died In the province of Tambooff the cholera has made very few ravages. At Jassan there have been 40 cases and 20 deaths. The couriers of the province of Kursk, Charkow, Orel, and Pultawa, have notarrived with intelligence. The news that the cholera had broken out anew in Perdia is confirmed by official reports. It has raged with great violence at Hoja and Jabris, and was spreading towards the province of Asiatic Turkey."

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

PARISIANA.

PARIS, October 26.

The polemics of the Parisian Papers, for the last few days, have been particularly stale, and the only fact to be gathered from their wordy comments on foreign affairs, is an additional evidence that the Government of his Majesty Louis Philippe, is resolved upon taking an open part with the Sonderbund Cantons of Switzerland. It is affirmed besides, by a journal, that new instructions have set been sent to the French Charge d'Affaires, at Berne, enjoining him, in he event of a war, to address a formal protest to the Vorort and take an immediate departure for France.

We learn by a Toulon letter, that the steam frigates Panama and Cacique and the steam sloop Ticon, with the Prince of Joinville on board, put out to sea on the 17th, to join the squadron for which they were carrying out supplies of provisions. After reaching the Isles of Hyères, his Royal Highness bore off again in the evening of the same day, steering, it is believed, for Civita Vecchia. It is stated that he has temporarily given up the command of our naval forces in the Mediterranean, to start on a diplomatic Mission to some of the Italian Governments

Our latest accounts from Algeria represent the colony in a most satisfactory state. By a recent decision of the Governor-General, it has been provided that the control direction of the Arab Affairs is no longer to exert a direct control over the native population in the division of Algiers. A special sub-direction, under General Changarnier, is established for the latter province, similar to those already existing at Oran and Constantine, and henceforth the central direction will only be called upon to apprehend the local administrations. A proclamation has been addressed by the Duke of Aumale to all the Arabs and Kabyles of Algeria, setting forth that nothing will be changed in the course adopted with respect to them by Marshal Bugeaud, who never acted but conformably to the will of the King; that they will always find the word of the French as steadfast as their force is irresistible, and that all the acts of the new Governor will only tend to augment the prosperity of the faithful allies and subjects of France.

The young Duke, moreover, is reported in the Presse to have made himself very popular already, by taking upon himself to obtain from the Ministry a prompt realisation of several useful measures, and especially the long delayed payment of indemnification to many land owners, natives and French, who were expropriated by the Government. Two fortunate expeditions have just been directed by native chiefs, against the only tribe of the Sahara, in the province of Oran, that had not come in to submission; the Ahmian Garbus.

Artillery and munitions of war, says the Patrie, are about to be sent to Senegal, for the forts which are to be erected there in defence of the territories

Father Asti, a new delegate of the Christian population of the Lebanon, has just arrived in France, to implore the protection of our Government. He is the bearer of a letter from Mgr. Marouite Prelate, to all the French, entreating them to take pity on their brethren, on those heartless sufferings it draws a heart-rending picture. At the date of this letter, August 26, nothing had been heard, in the Lebanon, of the messengers who, according to the pledged word of M. Guizot, should have reached Europe by the beginning of July

An ordonnance has been issued by the Minister of Finance, declaring that henceforth Prussian slips will enjoy, in the French ports, the same privileges with all navigators does that is granted to French traders, in the Prussian port, whenever they can prove that they were forced to put in for the preservation of the vessels and their cargoes.

The crusade of our Government against the Opposition press is more unrelenting than ever. On Tuesday last, the National was seized, at the Post-office, and at the place where it is published. Another judicial measure, among at the same results, was directed, on the 21st, against M. Wayrany, the delegate of the city of Bona, whose name has appeared frequently before the public, in connection with some charges of corruption against the public functionaries in Algeria, and who lately made a formal denunciation of them to the Procureur du Roi. It appears that General Delarue, and several other important personages, had lodged a complaint against him for defamation; and, although there be no precedent, nor any provision in the law to justify preventive confinement on such a charge, M. Warrany was arrested, and a visit paid by the police to his lodgings for the examination of his papers. It is given out that the Government intends, early in the next session of the Chambers, to bring in a bill for the abrogation of the law by which all the members of the Bonaparte family are excluded from the French territory.

If we are to credit the Presse and Univers, the Bank of France is to take an interest in the approaching loan, to the extent of 2,000,000 francs, for which it will subscribe at whatever rate the loan may be taken by M. de Rothschild. This decision is expected to lead to another, with a view to solicit the authorisation of the Government for augmenting the social capital of the Bank, which, though it was at first (in 1806) 90,000,000f., has since been reduced to 60,000,000f.

There is a report in the Paris Bourse of the revival of Pius IX., and the financial difficulties he might have to be exposed to by a war, have suggested to the Marquis Baudet d'Antheuil the idea of a general Committee of Subscription, which, by the aid of secondary ones, should receive the offerings of each to the Holy Father.

The Univers, on another hand, appeals to all the clergy, the faithful, and, especially, the French ladies, to rouse them into a generous rivalry towards the accomplishment of a similar project devised by the Archbishop of Lyons In the words of the Univers the object is nothing short of a civil list to be offered to his Holiness, by all Christendom, under the patronage of the French ladies.

The Minister of Commerce has just given three Doctors of the Faculty of Paris missions to go and study the progress of the cholera at Trebizond, Moscow, and Odessa.

The Indicateur de Bordeaux announces that the embankment for the railroad, at the Hill of Lormont, completely disappeared on the morning of the 21st. It sunk in on a sudden, to the extent of about fifty yards, leaving no trace of a work that was executed at a great cost.

On Thursday last the railway from St. Cre'i to Compiegne, a section of the Creil and St. Quentin Line, was opened to public circulation.

A train of merchandise, with a carriage containing passengers, has just made the journey from Paris to Chateaurenx.

SPAIN

The state of affairs in Spain may be summed up in a very few words, for no intelligence of importance has arrived. Narvaez yet remains in power; the Queen Mother is regaining her influence and power in the palace, and it is not difficult to surmise how she will employ them. The Queen Regent, and her husband, live together, and a decent semblance of concord is preserved in public, but prophecies are freely indulged in that a fresh explosion may shortly be expected; it is understood that serious differences exist, the Ring Consort desiring to undertake the management of the Royal patrimony, an arrangement to which Queen Isabel entertains insuperable objection.

PORTUGAL.

The Iberia, Captain Bowen, arrived on Wednesday at Southampton, with the Peninsular mails. The dates are Gibraltar, Oct. 19; Cadiz, 20; Lisbon, 21; Oporto, 23, and Vigo, 24

We have to report the failure of Lisbon of the house of Cockburn, Greig, and Co. The liabilities amount to £40,000. The Queen Dowager, on her way to Madeira, had arrived at Lisbon on the 22d, on board the Hecate. She was accompanied by the whole of the British squadron. The Queen of Portugal embarked in her state barge at the Arsenal, and visited the Queen Dowager on board the Hecate. She remained an hour on board, and then landed at Belem, where apartments had been held in readiness for the distinguished visitor

Her British Majesty was received on the Tagus, came into the Tagus, having on board the Duke of Palmella and family, who is merely en route for Madeira, on account of the delicate state of the Duchess' health. The Duke landed towards the evening of the 21st, the Queen Dowager proclaimed, and was immediately recognised, and received with marked respect. The Duke's arrival is by many connected with public affairs, and has thrown the Court and the Cabral faction generally into the greatest consternation.

The bad weather off the coast caused unusual delay in the arrival of the packet from England. In the Tagus there was a little fleet of merchantmen, waiting for the weather to moderate

On Monday morning last, there was a terrible storm all over Lisbon, accompanied by thunder and lightning, and the fall of two thunderbolts, one falling in Barriver close alongside the Portuguese Bank, and another strikes against the Convent of Santa Monica, and setting fire to a portion of the building, and doing considerable damage, besides causing the liveliest alarm to the residents

The Queen of the 21st announced the loss and total wreck, on the coast near Aveiro, of the English schooner Swana, of Dartmouth, from Newcastle, bound to Oporto, with coals. Master and crew saved. The English packet came to anchor in the afternoon of the 21st.

Shortly after the Duke of Palmella landed, a letter was addressed to him by Cabral, which was published in the Nacional, and written in her Majesty's name. The Duke proceeded to the Palace, and had an interview with the Queen which lasted three hours; nothing is absolutely known as to what took place, but the Queen is represented as having evinced a desire to conciliate; of course much speculation is afloat upon the subject. The Duke's friends affirm that the distinguished diplomatist is perfectly weary of the petty intrigues and trumpery broils in which Queen Donna Maria is continually implicated, and that he has no intention whatever of mixing himself up in public affairs. The Cabral journals accuse the Court of being too partial in not ordering the Duke out of the country forthwith.

The Ministry, it is believed, is on its last legs, and the civil governors of Oporto and Castello have sent in their resignations; it is even stated that Ministers have been requested to hasten their departure, and it is said that the Queen accepts their resignations, it will be difficult to avert a popular tumult—for who are to be their successors?

The first act of the new drama is over. The election for the Municipal Chambers of Lisbon took place on last Sunday, the 17th instant, and terminated in the triumphant return of the thirteen candidates put forward by the Committee of which Conde de Thomar (Costa Cabral) is president. The whole number of voters was 7869. Of that number the Cartistas polled 4774, and the Progressistas but 2395; giving a majority to the Cartistas of 2379. A majority was expected by all parties, but not so great a one. It is said that many Progressistas, conscious of the inutility of voting where defeat was beforehand certain, staid at home.

SWITZERLAND

It appears but too probable that the struggle will resolve itself into a civil war. It is not believed that the Catholic party will yield, encouraged as it is by the agents of France and Austria. The Diet met at Berne, on the 18th Instant, and, two days after, unanimously adopted a proclamation remarkable for the mildness and moderation of its tone, calling upon the Seven Cantons to relinquish a private alliance, which was inadmissible in the federal law, and contrary to the spirit of the most ancient treaties between the confederates. The Diet solemnly declares that it "does not wish either the organisation of the confederation, nor the destruction of the Sovereignty of the Cantons, nor the violent upsetting of the Cantonal Institutions, nor an Unitary Government, nor the violation of your rights of your religion. Her object is neither religion. It wishes rather to accord to all the Cantons, and loyally, the protection which they have a right to claim from their co-states against unjust attacks in the manner that the dispositions and the object of the common alliance demand;" and points out that the actual compact guarantees sufficient protection to the rights and liberties of the separate Cantons. After appealing to the seven Cantons not to persist in a position which "saps the foundation of federal rights, divides the confederates into two inimical camps, and thus compromises from without our independence and our liberties," the proclamation concludes with the following admonition :—

"The consequences that a perseverance in such a position may draw upon you and the whole country are incalculable. It depends yet on you to avoid them. Take resolutions such as your federal duties and this peace and honour of the Confederation, as well as of your own Cantons, require of you. What we wish is obedience to the law, the maintenance of the interior, security of the Confederation, and order. Faithful and dear confederates, give us fraternally your hands to attain this end, which is prescribed to us by the duties which we have sworn to fulfil. May God preserve and protect our dear country !"

The Diet has appointed federal delegates to go among the States of the Sonderbund with instructions to demand from the several Governments that the proclamation be made public. The delegates are to support by their representations the contents of the proclamation in presence of the chief authority of each Canton, and are instructed generally to act in accordance with its spirit.

On the 18th Inst., nearly the whole of the village of Provence, Canton de Vaud, was destroyed by fire. Forty-two houses were entirely consumed, and 220 persons, most of them poor, are left without shelter.

HANOVER.

The ratifications of the treaty between this kingdom and England, which was signed in London on the 24th August last, for the reciprocal protection of literary and artistic property, and the reduction of duties on the import of books and productions of the fine arts, has just been exchanged. Similar treaties exist between England and Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria.

AUSTRIA.

The cholera has broken out at Perecop, which is 50 German miles distant from Odessa, but it has not appeared at Odessa itself. It has entirely ceased at Taganrog and at Marcianopoli, more in the sea of Azoph. The Lloyd has just launched a new steamer, which has received the name of Venezia. It will ply from Trieste to Venice.

BAVARIA.

At the sitting of the Bavarian Chamber of Deputies held on the 19th, a motion for the total abolition of Jewish disabilities was made, and unanimously adopted. The Minister of Justice announced that the new code of laws for Bavaria was so far advanced that it might be presented during the season of 1848, or at latest in that of 1849. It will establish the oral examination of witnesses and the publicity of trials in the courts of law. Towards the end of the sitting, Baron de Closen, a member of great consideration in the Chamber, made an eloquent appeal in favour of the Duchies of Schleswig-Holstein, at the end of which the whole Chamber rose, in expression of its sympathy on the question.

RUSSIA.

Letters in the Frankfurter Journal of the 26th, announce the appearance of the cholera in the governments of Tschernigow, Riasan, and Tula, and in the cities of Jaroslaw, Kasan, Nisechi, and Orenow. The Marshal of the nobility, Von Witebsk Von Cechanowsk, a nobleman well known by his extensive travels in Europe and the East, was lately shot by a gamekeeper, who mistook him for a wild beast, on account of his head covering. The dying man fully exculpated the innocent author of his death.

POLAND.

The greatest apprehension is felt at Warsaw, at the approach of the cholera. It has carried off three-fourths of the population of Karkow, whence it came to Warsaw. Although it was the time of jubilee, the churches were filled at all hours. The wetness of the season has destroyed the potatoes and wheat, part of which are rotting in the ground, and everything announces a cruel famine. Crowds of poor persons, scarcely clad in rags, throng the streets. The charity of private persons and of benevolent societies is quite insufficient.

ITALY.

Accounts from Ferrara bring news of a serious nature. On the 14th of October some disturbances took place at Ferrara. A young man, having passed before a sentinel a cigar in which the Austrians gave a bonus, was struck with his bayonet. A priest interfering, to take the part of the young man, was also ill-treated. The people having then collected round the guard-house, the soldiers fired on them. One person was killed outright by the Austrians, and three detained prisoner. Some of the crowd recommended to sound the tocsin, and call upon the people to attack en masse the troops, but Cardinal Ciacchi exerted himself to calm the people, in the name of the Pope, and was taken prisoner and stored to the Pontifical authority. It is said that the Austrians have got a counter order as to the evacuation of the town. Austrian patrols, on horseback and on foot, were constantly in the town at the 15th.

The Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Tuscany, and the Hereditary Prince, made their solemn entry into Lucca on the 14th, where they were received by the civil and military authorities.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

By news from Constantinople to the 12th of October, it appears that Monsieur de Titoff, the Russian Ambassador at the Sublime Porte, had signified to the Sultan the Emperor Nicholas's full approval of the measures of coercion adopted by the British and French Greece, which, in conformity thereto, despatches from Russia had been forwarded to the Greek Cabinet, condemning in strong terms the obstinacy of the latter continues to manifest in refusing to accept the very reasonable and moderate satisfaction demanded by the Porte, and recommending his Majesty King Otho to make all the concessions necessary for the restablishment of friendly relations between the two Governments; a recommendation which, according as it does with the view taken of the question by Great Britain, is will be madness to turn a deaf ear to.

News from Athens, to the 14th of October, reports matters to be in a lamentable state. French influence appears on the decline, whilst that of Austria and Bavaria is paramount.

The insurgent chiefs, Farmaki, Valanea, Pappacosta, and Condojanni, are still in arms, occupying different positions, and carrying on a guerilla warfare.

MALTA.

The trial of Capt. Tate, of the brig Navy, and his wife, before the Criminal Court, has ended favourably to the prisoners, both of whom were, on the 17th October, acquitted : as whilst the public prosecutor failed in proving any wilful intent, his own witnesses went the length of establishing much blameable negligence and want of due vigilance on the part of the quarantine officers. The trial of Capt. Clark, of the brig Lord Hardinge, charged with a like crime under the same law, was fixed for the 19th of October, but our dates only reach to the afternoon of the 18th.

AMERICA.

ARRIVAL OF THE HIBERNIA.

By the Royal mail steam-ship Hibernia, Captain Ryrie, arrived at Liverpool, on Thursday evening, we have advices from New York to the 15th, Boston to the 16th, and Halifax to the 18th inst., respectively. She brings 90 passengers, and £12,000 in specie.

Accounts from Mexico, though mere rumours, are interesting. Santa Anna was stated to be at Guadaloupe, whence it was expected he would retreat to Oaxaca. This, however, is contradicted by rumours, which report that the American troops, after taking the city of Mexico, had numerous severe conflicts with the almost innumerable swarm of Leperos who inhabited and surrounded the capital, and that the latter finally became so annoying and destructive that they obtained the advantage over the American troops, who were finally under the necessity of retiring from the city. It is further said that Santa Anna had left his quarters at Guadaloupe, and returned to the capital at the head of an army of 10,000 regular troops, and that fighting had been resumed and was still going on desperately at the last accounts.

It was further stated that in consequence of the above report the Mexicans had become inspired, and were flying to arms throughout the country. Three thousand were reported to have gathered at Victoria.

In consequence of these reports, great anxiety was felt for the troops under General Scott.

A rumour, which is confirmed, states that Santa Anna had resigned the Presidency, and that the instrument of resignation was dated from Guadaloupe, the 16th of September ; but that the Mexican Congress would not dispose of or receive it, and had again placed him at the head of the army

General Rea is said to have gotten full possession of Puebla, but the Americans were preparing a deadly fire upon his troops from the surrounding heights commanding the town.

NEW ZEALAND.

There are accounts, by way of Sydney, of more fighting in New Zealand, the Maories having attacked, in open day, the settlement at Wanganui, and plundered some of the unfortified houses in the suburbs. An unremitting fire was directed against the settlers all day from a Maori fort, commanded by Lieut. Holmes, and the natives at last were compelled to retire, having lost their great chief, Makoiti, understood to be the prime mover in the rebellion. As soon as intelligence of these disastrous occurrences reached Auckland, Governor Grey proceeded to Wanganui, in her Majesty's steamer Inflexible, and landed there 100 men of the 65th regiment, and about 80 sailors. They proceeded up the river in boats, with military on each side of the river, but though the natives did not retire, they were in such close contiguity to fastnesses and to swamps, that it was deemed prudent not to attack them, so the reconnoitring party returned. Towards the close of May, the force at Wanganui was strengthened by Captain Stanley, Lieutenant Beresford, and thirty men from her Majesty ship Calliope, and early in June by a Lieutenant and 40 men from the same ship, 116 men of the 58th Regiment, Lieutenant Hon. W. C. Yelverton, and some artillery, all under the command of Lieutenant-Colonel M'Cleverty. Previous to the arrival of these reinforcements, the natives had retired up the river to a position difficult of access. It is stated that upon three or four occasions the military, civilians, police, &c., under the command of Governor Grey and Lieutenant-Colonel M'Cleverty with the sailors and marines under Captains Stanley, and Hobeson, R.N. in boats, went out, accompanied by some native allies, and 30 or 40 Maories, who were the advance party, but they could never come to close quarters with the enemy. On one of these occasions (a force of 5000 to 10,000 rounds of ball cartridges, with rockets, from the boats, were expended, and the rebels were firing at the expedition from behind cover, they never touched a man, and all the loss ascertained has been stated as four killed and a few wounded on the enemy's side The last accounts from the expedition are furnished by letter from Wellington, the 18th June, which says, that it appeared from intelligence received the previous night, that the number of killed and wounded on the enemy's side was stated at 40, but certainly 30 had suffered. The troops advanced on each side of the river, while the gun-boats cleared the banks, ravines, and gullies, with their guns and rockets, so as to prevent an ambush, and on one occasion when considerably in advance of the troops, the boats fell in with a large body of the enemy; and had the land forces come up at that time, probably we should have almost annihilated them. Most unfortunately, however, the troops were recalled a retreat, and the enemy quickly took up a position in a ravine, which commanded the ground to be passed over by Lieutenant Colonson, R E , and 70 men of the 58th, who would shortly have been in motion to attack the position on the arrival of the blue-jackets, under Captains Stanley and Hosseson, of the Inflexible, who cleared the ravine with their great guns and rockets."

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

The October session of the above Court commenced on Monday. There were present at the opening of the Court, the Lord Mayor, the Recorder, Aldermen Hooper, the Lord Mayor elect, Sir C. Hunter, Sir C. Marshall, Gibbs, &c. ; Messrs. Cubitt and Hill, the Sheriffs for the ensuing year ; Messrs. France and Wire, the Under-Sheriffs, &c

There are 247 prisoners for trial at the present session.

The Grand Jury was sworn, and, having been addressed by the Recorder, retired.

THE ATTEMPTED MURDER IN MARK LANE.

John Gorniston (aged 54), upholsterer, (remanded from last session), was on Wednesday placed at the bar, before Mr. Justice Maule and Mr. Justice Cresswell, charged with feloniously shooting at John Crawley, with intent to murder him. There were other counts in the indictment, charging the prisoner with intent to do Crawley grievous bodily harm. The prisoner, who appeared in a weak and dejected state, was allowed a chair.

Mr. Ryland and Mr. Laurie were counsel for the prosecution, and Mr. Clarkson appeared for the prisoner.

The facts have been so fully published that it is unnecessary to print all the evidence in detail. The examination of Mr. Crawley will be sufficient to recall the facts to the recollection of our readers. He deposed as follows : I am a wine-merchant, residing in Mark-lane. I know the prisoner at the bar : in November last year he was appointed one of the assignees to a person named Bond, a publican. Mr. Crocker was the other assignee. I supplied goods, on the credit of the assignees, in the months of November, December, and January, to the amount of £150. I was to have been paid in two months, but was not; consequently I brought an action against the prisoner and Crocker. I knew there was an execution put into prisoner's house in August last, and on Saturday, the 14th of that month, his goods were sold under a writ of execution. On that day, about four o'clock, I was sent for to my counting-house on arriving there I saw the prisoner; he was sitting in a chair in the counting-house. I asked him if he wished to see me ; he nodded his head ; I then asked him to walk into an inner room, which he did, and I shut the door. The prisoner said, "What does all this mean?" I was about to reply, when I received a wound from a pistol shot. I immediately ran out of the room, and was afterwards taken to St. Thomas's Hospital. The only peculiarity I at first noticed in the prisoner's demeanour was a sullen manner.

Mr. Yates, clerk to Mr. Crawley, the policeman, and other witnesses, were next examined, and deposed to the facts which have been already amply detailed in the police reports, and the case for the prosecution having closed,

Mr. Clarkson addressed the Jury for the defence. He did not attempt to deny that it was the hand of the prisoner that had committed the act, but he hoped to satisfy the Jury that at the time it was committed, the prisoner was in such a state of mind as not to render him criminally responsible for the act of which he was undoubtedly guilty. If he should succeed in establishing that fact to their satisfaction, he reminded them it would not have the effect of relieving him from all punishment, but he would be enabled to make such a case as would render it impossible for him to do any violence either upon himself or any other person in future. The learned counsel then proceeded to comment upon the circumstances of the case, and said that the most important question to decide was that of the state of mind of the prisoner at the time he committed the act; and if he should show them, by undoubted testimony, that during the whole of his life the prisoner had been remarkable for his kind and amiable character, and that his mind had been overwhelmed by the distress and misfortunes that had come upon him, the climax of which was the sale of all he possessed under the execution, and which had completed his ruin, in all probability he would feel any difficulty in coming to a conclusion that it was during a temporary paroxysm of madness, thereby occasioned, that he committed the act of which he was now charged. He was ready to admit that almost immediately afterwards the reason of the prisoner returned to him, and that at the present moment he was perfectly sane; but this did not, in any way, affect the proposition that he had submitted to the Jury, that, at the time when the act was accomplished, he was not in such a state of mind as to be responsible, criminally for what he did. A great number of witnesses were examined for the defence

Mr. Clarke Maule then summed up, and the Jury, after deliberating for a short time in the box, expressed a wish to retire. They were absent for half an hour, when they returned into court, and gave a verdict of "Not Guilty," on the ground of insanity.

The prisoner was ordered to be detained during her Majesty's pleasure.

John Green, 19, was indicted for stealing, at Richmond, a loaf of bread.—The prisoner, who appeared in a miserable condition, pleaded Guilty.—Mr. Cope informed the Court that when he was brought into the gaol, he was in a very destitute state, and seemed to be almost starved.—The Recorder sentenced him to be imprisoned in Newgate for seven days, and he requested Mr. Cope to have inquiries made in order to ascertain if he had any friends who would do anything for him.

MIDDLESEX SESSIONS.

The October Adjourned Sessions commenced on Monday at the Court House, Clerkenwell. There were 81 prisoners for trial, 9 of whom were misdemeanours, the remainder being felons. Amongst the 81 prisoners there were 27 unable either to read or write. 16 who could only read, while of the remaining 31 were described as able to read and write "imperfectly." The Assistant Judge, in his charge to the Grand Jury, informed them that after that day the House of Detention for the confinement of accused parties previous to their trial, would be ready for their reception.

Jane Price was indicted for stealing a gold watch, value £10, the property of Joseph Warren, from his person. It appeared that on the evening of the 11th inst., the prosecutor was accosted by the prisoner, who followed him, although he repeatedly desired her to go away ; and at length she made a snatch at his watch, which was in his waistcoat pocket, and having snapped the chain she ran off with both. She was stopped by a policeman, but she refused to give up the watch except the prosecutor would let her go ; and upon being taken to the station-house she endeavoured to slip it into the lap of another woman. Verdict, guilty. The prisoner had been twice before convicted ; and was, therefore, transported for ten years.

ROBBING A TRADE SOCIETY'S BOX.—Edward Probert, the secretary to the Silk Hatters' Trade Society, held at the Black Bull public house, in Upper Thames-street, was charged, on Tuesday, with having stolen £20 8s. 0½d. out of the box. Mr. Humphreys attended for the prosecution. To the box it appeared there were three locks, which required three different keys, one of which was kept by the president, another by the vice-president, and the third by the secretary. It was necessary, according to the regulations of the Society, that the three persons should be present upon the opening of the box. The secretary, however, determined to dispense with the presence of the two other officers and on Saturday, last, with the assistance of a blacksmith, possessed himself of the whole of the contents of the box, with which he went off to Bristol, where, however, before he spent all the money, he was apprehended and conveyed in prison. The sum of £5 and 4d. was found upon his person, and, when he was asked what he had done with all the rest, he said it was spent.—The prisoner was remanded.

MARYLEBONE.

ROBBERY BY A SHOPWOMAN.—Tuesday was the day appointed for the re-examination of Anne Simmons, shopwoman to Messrs. Marshall and Sutton, Vere-street, Oxford-street, and the Court was much crowded.—The evidence given on the first occasion went to show that the prisoner had been upwards of two years in the service of the prosecutors, who, at length, had some suspicion with regard to her honesty, and gave her into the custody of Allison, an officer of the D division, No. 88, who, after she was locked up, searched her boxes, and found therein an immense quantity of silks, satins, muslins, gloves, stockings, &c., together with numerous letters and papers. Identification of the said property as being the property of Messrs. Marshall and Co. was fully established, and the prisoner was therefore remanded. She was brought up again on Tuesday, and from what transpired, it would seem that a systematic plan of robbery had been carried on by the prisoner to an extraordinary extent. Allison now brought forward two large boxes, containing valuable goods worth nearly £1000, which he found at the chambers of Mr. F. D. Hickman, 18, Lincoln's Inn-fields, his attention having been attracted thereto by a letter in the possession of the prisoner, and which bore the address in question. Mr. Hickman admitted to the officer that he had been acquainted with the prisoner Simmons for two years, and that she had been in the habit of coming to him occasionally at his chambers. Mr. Hickman was sent for, and was present, under surveillance, during the investigation. The prisoner was remanded till Tuesday next, and Mr. Hickman was ordered to enter into his own recognizances in £200, and to find two sureties in £100 each, for his being forthcoming on the day named. Mr. Hickman said that he should be quite prepared to prove his entire innocence with regard to any guilty knowledge respecting the property found at his chambers, as alluded to by the police constable. It is stated that the amount of property taken is between £3000 and £3000.

On Wednesday, R. Simmons, a man upwards of sixty years of age, the father of Anne Simmons, who had been charged the previous day, was charged as a receiver of a large portion of the plunder. He was brought up from Market Harborough, by Inspector Tilman, of the D division. His residence was at a village called Gumley, near the place first mentioned, and, from information received by Mr. Marshall, he and the inspector proceeded to prisoner's dwelling. On both men acquainted with their business, the prisoner, after some hesitation and denial of guilt, delivered up a large hair trunk and a wooden box, which were found to contain an immense amount of silks, satins, &c., which were identified by Mr. Marshall as belonging to him and his partner. The prisoner reserved his defence, and was remanded till Tuesday.

WORSHIP STREET

EXTRAORDINARY ATTEMPT TO UPSET RAILWAY TRAINS.—A man, a middle-aged man of very respectable appearance, with full face, coloured face, and who had given his name William Jameson at the police-station, but now admitted that to be false, and stated his name to be William Jackson, was placed at the bar before Mr. Arnold, upon the very serious charge of having deliberately placed large stones upon the rails of the Eastern Counties Railway, apparently with intent to upset the trains. The prisoner, in a rather unconcerned way, said that, to save time, he would plead guilty to having thrown the stones on the line, but without any improper motive. He was informed, however, that it was for the magistrate to be summarily disposed of, and the evidence in support of the charge must be taken. Mr. Charles Johnson, a gentleman of property, resident at Leytonn, in Essex, was then sworn, and stated that on Monday morning, between seven and five o'clock, he was fishing in the river Lea, between Leyton and Stratford, and about two hundred yards from the Cambridge line of the Eastern Counties Railway, when he saw the prisoner get over a gate which separates a field from the railway, and then saw him take up some large paving stones that lay near, and throw them on the line. They were very large stones, some of them 50lb. weight, and he heard them as they fell upon the line, and he then laid down his fishing rod to see who was the prisoner. The latter was then stooping down over the rails, but he was then sideways towards witness, who could not exactly see what he was doing with the stones. After having been about a minute in that position, and after stooping over them he returned over the same gate, and walked towards the witness, who waited until he came near, and then spoke to him, and asked him if he had been clearing the rail, to which he replied, "No," and appeared quite unconcerned, and said a few minutes in conversation. The witness then saw a train approaching from London, and said, "Why, here's the train." The prisoner said nothing to that, but when the train passed the spot where he had thrown the stones he was held quickly away. The train passed that spot without apparent obstruction, but near the place called the Lodge, 300 or 300 yards further on, suddenly stopped, and a man got down and ran back to the spot before mentioned. The witness then ran across to meet him, and, seeing him removing stones from the rails, pointed out to the prisoner. The latter then began to run, but the guards got off the train and ran after him, and captured him. The witness, in answer to a question, said the prisoner appeared to him as if he had been drinking a little, but seemed to know perfectly well what he was about. This evidence was fully borne out by the guards of the train, and the prisoner was committed for trial.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

FATAL BOILER EXPLOSION.—A boiler explosion, which has already resulted in the death of four persons, and so severely scalded four others that not the least hopes can be entertained of their recovery, occurred on Thursday morning (last week), at New Hay, near Two Bridges, about two miles from Rochdale, on the premises occupied by Mr. Samuel Berry as a woollen manufactory. The buildings in the whole formed three sides of a square, the fourth being the end of the new mill. The space thus left was partially covered by a roof supported by pillars, and was a place of resort for children of the mill during their leisure time, and, on the morning in question, about half-past eight o'clock, seven or eight of them were playing there, when the boiler exploded with a fearful noise, and in an instant the whole of the out-premises were reduced to ruins. The children instantly rushed to the door to escape, but the door had been driven inwards by the force of the explosion, and it was some time before it could be opened. Of those that was accomplished five of the children were found most frightfully scalded, and they were removed to some of the adjacent houses. The total number of persons injured is eight, of whom John Leach, aged 56, a weaver, was lying lingering in agony for a couple of hours, expired. Grant Taylor, aged 11 years, died as a late hour on Thursday night ; Thomas Clegg, aged 11, died on the half-past nine on Friday morning ; and Thomas Sutcliffe, aged 10 years, expired at twelve o'clock on the same day. At present it is impossible to state how the explosion occurred, but the general opinion is that it was occasioned from an imperfect supply of water.

FIRE. On Saturday morning last, a most destructive fire took place on the premises of Messrs. W. and W. Lake, in Thorne's-lane, Wakefield. The proprietors, it appears, have also extensive flax and cotton mills at Sandal, in the vicinity of the Messrs. Ferrandes, Mr. Thomas Haigh, and other large firms, were with difficulty saved, the dwelling-houses of those who reside in the vicinity were placed in imminent danger. The whole of the machinery and stock were completely destroyed, and nothing more than the bare walls of the mill are left standing. The building was insured to the extent of £1000, a sum much below its real value. The destruction of property is estimated at £2500. Of the origin of the fire no accurate idea can be formed. There was happily no loss of life.

FATAL FIGHT.—Mr. Wakley held an inquest on Wednesday on the body of Thomas Burningham, a greengrocer's servant, at the Fitz's Hoe, Portland Town. Deceased had quarrelled with a man named Good, in the same trade, and the two went into a field near Primrose Hill, at 11 o'clock on Sunday night, to settle their differences by a fight. They fought one round and both fell. Good rose directly, and deceased was also in the act of rising, when he fell again as if by a blow from his antagonist. No one saw Good strike the blow; but he acknowledged he had knocked deceased down. Dr. Bernard Shee deposed to the effusion of blood on the brain without any corresponding external injury, and the surgeon could not swear positively that a blow had been the cause of the effusion. After a long deliberation, the jury returned a verdict of "Manslaughter."

THE ALLEGED MURDER AT GRAVESEND. On Saturday, William Wilson was again brought before the magistrates, when further evidence was taken respecting the charge of his having caused the death of his wife. The wretched man appeared to be labouring under deeper dejection of mind and debility of body than at the previous examinations. The magistrates held a short consultation, and committed the prisoner for trial at the next assizes for Kent, on the charge of manslaughter. All the witnesses were bound over in heavy personal recognizances to appear.

UNITED YACHT CLUB.—This Society, which is composed of members of the fourteen Royal Yacht Clubs of Great Britain and Ireland, will take possession of their new club rooms, at the Thatched House Tavern, early in November, previous to which a general meeting will be held. Rear-Commodore Kent, R.H.Y.C., is now acting as Honorary Secretary, and nearly all the other flag-officers of the Yacht Clubs have already joined this useful Society.

POSTAGE REGULATIONS.—The Gazette of Tuesday contains a Treasury warrant directing that for the future packages which in length, breadth, or width, exceed twenty-four inches, shall not be forwarded by the post between any places within the United Kingdom, excepting, however, petitions or addresses to her Majesty, or petitions to either House of Parliament forwarded to any Member of either House, or printed votes or proceedings of Parliament, or letters to or from any Government offices or departments. It also directs that if any letter is sent, or delivered in order to be sent by post, between places within the United Kingdom, that the postage shall be prepaid in money, by the letter be duly stamped. It further orders that all such letters of twenty-four or more inches in dimensions, or above four ounces in weight, may be detained and opened, as the opinion of the Postmaster General, or chief clerk for the time being, with a charge of double the amount of postage. This warrant is dated the 22nd of October, 1847, and is signed Richard C. Wood and R. W Rollew.—The following notice has also been issued from the General Post-office :—"General Post-office, October, 1847. Postmaster General of the United States having given a notice for determining the agreement under which the correspondence between Great Britan and Canada has been conveyed, in closed mails, through the territories of the United States, as well as all other agreements subsisting between the Post-offices of the two countries, the mails to and from Canada will henceforth be landed and embarked at Halifax, Nova Scotia, instead of Boston, as heretofore. All letters and newspapers, therefore, addressed to Canada, will in future be forwarded by the way of Halifax, N.S., unless specially directed to be sent by some other route, and as the arrangement under which United States postage has hitherto been collected in Canada is also suspended by the notice alluded to, all letters for Canada, which the writers desire to have forwarded by the way of the United States, should be addressed to the care of parties in the United States, or they will otherwise be detained for the postage due for their transit through the American territory. The postage on letters to and from Canada, forwarded vid Halifax, N S , will be 1s. 2d. the half ounce, as at present, but no charge will be made on newspapers either in the United Kingdom or in Canada. By command of the Postmaster-General,' These regulations will take effect on and after the 3d of November next.

CHARGE AGAINST A CHEMIST.—An inquest was held on Tuesday, before Mr. Mills, at the Seymour Arms, near Bryanstone-square, on the body of Emma Elizabeth Turner, aged two years, the child of a dairyman in Adam-street West. The case at first appeared to be an ordinary death from scarlatina, which was proved to be present in the house, but it assumed a new feature in consequence of the assertion of Mr. Moat, a surgeon in the neighbourhood, that, on a post mortem examination, he had found a considerable portion of morphia in the contents of the stomach. This, involving as it did the character of the chemist who had supplied the powder for the child, led to the adjournment of the inquest, in order to apply further chemical test. Mr. Theophilus Redwood, professor of chemistry to the Pharmaceutical Society, analysed the remainder of the contents found in the child's stomach, and found morphia in considerable proportions as scarcely to be distinguishable. His opinion led to a discussion and conflict of chemical opinions ; the inquest was adjourned for a considerable period, and then returned a verdict, "That the child died from natural causes, there was not sufficient evidence before the jurors to show," accompanied with a strong expression of opinion by the Jury of the danger and illegality of the practice of chemists in prescribing for ailing persons without seeing them.

THE EAST ANGLIAN RAILWAY.

THE PORT OF LYNN AND THE "HARBOUR BRANCH" OF THE RAILWAY.

We this week commemorate, in a series of very effective Illustrations, the opening of the Lynn and Ely Railway, which took place on Monday last, with great éclat. This Line, it should be mentioned, is the most important section of the East Anglian system; since, it will bring a very valuable district of the eastern part of the country into railway communication, not only with the metropolis, but with the northern and western parts of the kingdom; while it will add materially to the low lands traversed by the various lines. The termini of this newly-opened line are—one at Lynn, and the other at Ely, the point of junction with the Eastern Counties Railway.

This new Line, (26½ miles in length,) though running through a perfectly level country, possesses a peculiar interest, from its traversing a vast and fertile district, less than a century ago covered by water; many vain, because unscientific, attempts having been previously made, dating even from the Roman occupation of this Island, to reclaim and adapt the land for cultivation. The productive and remunerative farming of the Fens of Norfolk is one of the greatest triumphs of steam; for that was the effective agent at length employed in the hands of the Bedford Level Corporation, to give value to, or rather to create, this extensive territory! Even within a recent period, lands estimated at £3 or £4 an acre, have been enhanced in value, not merely one hundred per cent., but even one hundred fold.

With the exception of a few rather expensive viaducts, forced upon the Company by the Drainage and Canal Commissioners (who, however, are themselves contented with very rude and economical structures, on a level with the river banks), the Line, passing, as it does, through a level and easy, as well as a fertile country, exhibits few specimens of ambitious or costly engineering; all is simple, strong, substantial, as well as economical.

On the first section of the Line, from Lynn to Downham, which was opened exactly a year ago, viz., on the 29th October, 1846, (six months after the turning of the first turf), there is a rather costly iron and brick bridge raised over the turnpike-road, not far from the town; beyond this, for ten or eleven miles continuously, there is neither embankment nor excavation.

The works further opened this week, complete the Line to its junction with the Eastern Counties Railway at Ely; and the branch of ten miles from Wattington to the great corn market of Wisbeach, will be opened in about a month; thus perfecting the intercommunication of Yarmouth, Peterborough, and other very important places.

The first two miles of the Line beyond Downham comprise three extensive viaducts over the Ouse; one of these having nine openings, with a centre arch spanning the river, of 120 feet; all of them being imposed on the Company by the Bedford Level opposition.

In the mode of crossing the bog leading to the main viaduct, and in forming a foundation upon beds of quicksand for the piers of an iron girder bridge, crossing the canal at Wisbeach, the engineer of the Line, Mr. J. S. Valentine, has exhibited great skill and capability. In the former case, foundation after foundation was swallowed up in the swamps, piles sunk, trenches dug; thorns, brushwood, and timber, spread over the surface; and the difficulty was only to be surmounted by topping a dry sandy soil till it settled firmly in the bed, the moisture being pressed out from beneath; and the works here are now as strong and durable as on any portion of the Line. A different contrivance is resorted to in the case of the Wisbeach quicksands. A platform of timber is actually laid under the bed of the canal, extending along the adjacent ground; and upon this are firmly sunk the piers for an iron bridge of thirty-five feet span, consisting of six girders of four tons each.

The branch to Wisbeach will be characterised also by a few viaducts of large span, constructed to meet the views of the Middle Level Draining Commissioners.

The Line was opened by a train, well filled with passengers, leaving Lynn for Ely, on Monday morning, which returned in the afternoon: at the bridges over the Ouse and Wissey, the up train to Ely was stopped to afford the passengers an opportunity of inspecting the peculiarity of the structure.

"The bridge and viaduct over the river Wissey (says the Lynn Advertiser,) is 105 yards in length, and consists of one opening of 70 feet span over the water-way, similar in construction to the bridge over the river Ouse, and seven side openings of 30 feet span. The viaduct over the river Ouse (See the Engraving) is 150 yards long, and consists of ten side openings of 30 feet span each, with a single span over the water-way of 121 feet 6 inches. The roadway over this great space is by suspending the platform from three timber bows, each formed of 3-inch deals, firmly united together by oak transits; the suspension-rods are of wrought iron, of the very best material and workmanship; each rod has been proved to be equal to a strain of 20 tons, and as there are 72 of these rods, the weight they are capable of supporting is 1440 tons, but the greatest weight which they will be required to carry will not exceed 310 tons—the platform itself being 160 tons, and the greatest load which can be placed upon it being about 150 tons; but even this weight is never likely to come upon the bridge, except for the sake or experiment. The piers upon which the super-structure rests are built of Yorkshire stone, the foundations resting upon the solid gault at a depth of about 30 feet below the top of the banks.

"When Captain Wynne, the Railway Inspector, inspected the railway between Ely and Denver, the Ouse Bridge was tested by placing on it four engines and four tenders, laden with coke and water, and five waggons, laden with six tons of iron each. The weight may be fairly taken as follows:—

Four engines and tenders, 26 tons each	..	..	104 tons.
Five loaded waggons, 9 tons each	..	..	45
Men and other things, say	..	..	1
Total	..	..	150 tons.

"With this weight, the bridge sunk 5-16ths of an inch only; and, it is more than probable that, when this bridge has come to its proper bearing, it will not sink more than one-eighth of an inch under all the weight that the bridge can hold."

On the return of the party, in the afternoon, the event of the day was celebrated by a public entertainment, in the Town Hall, at Lynn. The Mayor (Mr. Carter) presided, having, on his right, Mr. Lacy, M.P. Mr. C. Williams, and Mr. Armes; on his left, Sir W. Folkes, Bart., several of the ex-Directors of the Line, and Mr. Roney, Secretary to the Eastern Counties Railway. The guests numbered about 130.

Lord George Bentinck, M.P.; Mr. Hudson, M.P.; and Mr. Waddington, M.P.; were expected; but could not attend.

The usual introductory toasts having been duly honoured, Mr Armes proposed "The Health of Mr. Lacy, M.P., and the Directors of the East Anglian Railway," which was drunk with three times three.

Mr. Lacy returned thanks, and, in doing so, adverted to the "fashionable" desire to attribute the present monetary pressure to railway speculation and its consequences. He observed that he did not see how the credit of the country could be affected by employing large classes of the population upon works of the greatest possible public utility, and paying good wages to the men so employed; nor could he see that railway companies were chargeable with the speculation that had prevailed in this branch of our national enterprise. The spirit of railway speculation, against which so much was now charged, had not been fostered by the old companies, but had been encouraged by a certain great man, (Sir Robert Peel,) who one day took a spade in his hand, and declared that direct lines were the thing. All the world were immediately up in arms for direct lines; bubbles swarmed, and, he believed, direct as the Lynn and Ely Line was, that if a "direct" Lynn and Ely line, so called had been brought forward in 1845, the very name of it would have secured it patronage and support. Mr. Lacy then offered some observations on what he termed the absurdity of supposing that the principle of our gold currency is a reality, and proposed, "The prosperity of the Town and Trade of Lynn."

The Mayor returned thanks.

"The health of Sir William Folkes, and the ex-Directors of the East Anglian Railway;" "the Solicitors of the Company" (acknowledged by Mr. C. Williams); "their Secretary and Engineer, and the Directors of the Eastern Counties Railway" (acknowledged by Mr. Roney, Secretary); with several other toasts, were afterwards given and drunk with much applause, and the company separated shortly before twelve o'clock.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

The first of our Illustrations shows the Harbour of Lynn, with the Railway branch to the bank of the river, showing the great facility with which vessels may be laden or unladen.

The second Engraving shows the stupendous Bridge across the Ouse, which we have already described. This was an object of great curiosity to the passengers, who alighted from the train to examine its peculiar construction.

The third Scene is taken from the Railway crossing the Cam, near its junction with the Eastern Counties Line; showing the city of Ely and its noble Cathedral, with its lofty western tower, 270 feet high, and a massive assemblage of gables rising upon the picturesque river-bank.

The Ely Station, with its general business, is shown in the fourth Illustration. It is an extensive pile, in pleasing mixed Grecian and Italian style.

MUSIC.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

The début of Miss Birch is fixed for Friday night, in the character of Mathilde, in Rossini's "Guillaume Tell." For such an interesting event as the first appearance of an English vocalist as a French prima donna, on the boards of the famed Académie Royale de Musique, I need scarcely state that I have prolonged my stay in Paris. Duprez will be his Arnold, and Barrolhet Guillaume Tell. Next week you shall have a full account of the honours paid to perfide Albion, in the person of one of her most gifted singers. Mdlle. Alboni quitted Paris last Thursday morning, on her way to Pesth, where she will remain a month, returning here in December. The Directors have been left in ignorance as to her intentions. It is, however, probable that she will prefer to accept an engagement at the Italian Opera, than to sing in French opera. Gerito and St. Leon have been well received, but their success has not been overwhelming. The ballet of "La Fille de Marbre" is very indifferent; it is a mixture of "Alma" and the "Marble Maiden." Pugni's music is so bad, that the entire weight of the ballet fell on the dancers, of whom St. Leon, strange to say, pleased more than his cara sposa, Gerito. This failure of "La Fille de Marbre"—for it can be styled nothing else—has accelerated the début of Miss Birch. Verdi's "Jerusalem" ("I Lombardi") will be rehearsed with full orchestra this week, and will be produced the 16th of November, introducing a new prima donna from Belgium, Mdme Julian Van Gelder.

At the Theatre Italien, the old repertoire is going the round. Mario is, however, as yet the only singer who has fairly taken the audiences by storm. Grisi did not sing Norma as she sang it at Covent Garden. Gardoni's Polliо is very weak. Ronconi has been singing very out of tune in the Puritani and Lucia, but he will take his revenge in Mercadante's "Bravo," which is preparing for him, Grisi, Castellan, &c. It is now almost official that Grisi and Mario have signed a contract, on enormous terms, for St Petersburgh, for the season 1848-1849, at the period when the Royal Italian Opera in London is not open. Their engagement here with Vatel expires in March next. Mdme Viardot Garcia, it is expected, will be the successor of Grisi here. Nothing, in the way of music, has pleased me more in Paris than some performances at the Opera Comique, such as Halevy's "Eclair" and "Monsquetaires de la Reine," Auber's "Sirène," "Macon," &c. The orchestra, although not so good as when it was formerly conducted by Girard (Labarre, the Harpist and Composer, is the present chef), is still the best in Paris, always excepting, of course, Habeneck's Conservatoire phalanx. There is a charming actress and singer in Mdlle. Darcier, in the Anna Thillon school; and Mdlle. Lavoye and her sister, Mdlle. Grimm, &c., possess considerable talents. But the star of the Salle Favart is Roger, the tenor, one of the finest actors I have ever seen on any stage, and a most delightful singer. He should be heard in Boieldieu's "Dame Blanche," singing the air of "Robin Adair," to have a notion of the charm of his organ. He goes to Italy next spring, and, I have no doubt, will have great success. Three new operas are preparing at the Opera Comique—the first by Auber; the second by Reber, a composer who has gained great glory in instrumental music, and the third by Balfe; the libretto by Scribe and St. Georges. A one act opera by Hecquet, the critic of the National, is also accepted.

Mr. Mitchell has gone to Brussels, but will return here on Thursday to complete his arrangements for the Opera Comique, at the St. James's Theatre. He has engaged Mdlle. Charton and M. Coudere, formerly of the Brussels troupe which was in London formerly.

Madame Jullien is still here. She was unable to arrange with Madame Pauline Viardot Garcia for Drury Lane Theatre, as the latter leaves in a few days to sing in German at Dresden, and from thence she will go to Hamburg, prior to her campaign for January, February, and March, in Berlin. Madame Jullien has now engaged Madame Dorus Gras, who will open the season in "Lucia," with Mr. Reeves as tenor, and Mr. Whitworth Jones as baritone. Miss Birch, Miss Susan Hobbs, and Miss Mossent, are also engaged.

Madame Pischek is so dangerously ill, that there will be some delay in the arrival of Pischek. Standigl is expected at a later period.

Berlioz, the celebrated composer, leaves Paris early next week for London, to assume his functions as Musical Director and Conductor, at Drury Lane Theatre; prior to the opening of which for Opera, a Concert will be given on the 20th at Covent Garden, by the permission of Mr. Beale, to enable the public to hear the works of Berlioz, which have created such sensation in France, Germany, Russia, &c. Amongst these compositions are his "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony, his "Harold" Symphony, Roman Carnival, &c. Balfe is also composing an opera for Drury Lane, also Edward Loder. The work of the former is founded on the ballet of "Lady Henriette," and of the latter on "Pizarro."

Benedict is expected here daily from Stuttgardt, where his opera of the "Crusaders" will be produced at the end of November. In Vienna, at the An der Wien, three English operas are in rehearsal—Benedict's "Crusaders," Balfe's "Bondman," and Wallace's "Maritana." Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will be done at Vienna in about a fortnight; so that England is now supplying Germany with original works liberally. Benedict and Balfe's operas may now be heard in Hamburg, Munich, Dresden, &c.

M. JULLIEN'S PROMENADE CONCERTS.—The Swiss Quadrilles, although not likely to be so popular as the Irish, Scotch, and English Quadrilles, contain some very clever imitative effects.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah" will commence the opening season on the 17th of November.

SOCIETY OF BRITISH MUSICIANS.—The series of concerts will begin on the 1st of November.

M. Adolphe Adam is actively engaged in Paris preparing for the opening of the new Opera National.

Mr. Costa is expected to return to Paris in November, from his journey to Italy, to make engagements for the Royal Italian Opera. Mr. Lumley, who has been to Berlin and Leipzick, is also expected shortly in Paris.

JUDGES OF THE SUPERIOR COURTS.—At the commencement of Michaelmas Term, on Tuesday next, the several courts of law and equity will be opened, when the learned Judges will resume their labours. There are, it seems, in the United Kingdom, 51 Judges of the superior courts; 22 in England, 15 in Ireland, and 13 in Scotland. The Judges of the inferior courts, exclusive of the County Court Judges in England, number 312. In England, the salaries of the 22 Judges of the superior courts amount to £223,641; of the Judges of the Court of Chancery, five in number, amount to £30,000; the Lord Chancellor has £10,000; the Master of the Rolls, £7700; the Vice-Chancellor of England, £6000; and the two Vice-Chancellors, £5000 each. The salaries of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench are stated at £23,900. The Lord Chief Justice has £8000, and the four Puisne Judges, £5020 each. The salaries are the same in the Court of Common Pleas, and also in the Court of Exchequer, with the exception of the Chief Baron, who has £7000. The Judges of the Court of Admiralty has £4000, and the average emoluments of the Judge of the Prerogative Court are returned at £3077.

POSTSCRIPT.

The Queen will hold a Privy Council on Saturday next, at one o'clock, at the Castle. Lord John Russell arrived at the Castle on Thursday, on a visit to her Majesty.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT.—Parliament has been summoned to meet for the despatch of business on the 18th of November, when, it is understood, after the formalities which usher in a new House, Ministers will immediately ask a legislative sanction for their late measure.

SECESSION FROM THE ESTABLISHED CHURCH.—The Rev. Mr. Chirol, Curate of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, was yesterday received into the Church of Rome, at St. Mary's, Chelsea. The Right Rev. Dr. Wiseman officiated at the ceremony, assisted by several clergy of the Roman communion. Mrs. Chirol, and Mrs. Chirol, son., the lady and mother of the reverend gentleman, made their profession of obedience to the Roman Catholic Church at the same time.

COMMERCIAL FAILURES.—The stoppage of two country banks was made known on Friday—the Salisbury, and the Shaftesbury and Hindon. Letters from St Petersburg mention the failure of C. Rivs and Co. The amount of their liabilities is not stated, but the lowest estimate formed by those who are acquainted with the business of the firm ranges from £150,000 to £200,000. From Lisbon, accounts have arrived of the failure of Messrs. Joseph Mettler and Sons, caused by the stoppage of Mr. F. J. Vanzeller, of London, which took place on the 7th inst. The liabilities in this case are not large. At Oporto, Messrs. Cockburn, Greig, and Co., have suspended, also in consequence of the pressure on account of their London correspondents. By advices from Liverpool to Thursday, so far as ascertained, no fresh disasters are now anticipated, in consequence of the new advices from the Money Market, and in banking affairs no change of an untoward character has occurred.

[illegible]nesday, a special meeting of the Dock Committee of Birkenhead was held at their office, in Liverpool, to consider a communication relative to the docks, received from the office of Woods and Forests. The propositions of the Government were in substance that the Government should compound for the purchase of the north side of the entrance to the great float, the Woods and Forests, in such case, defraying the expense of completing the sea-wall, estimated at £44,000. The Government to receive as security township-bonds to the amount of £55,000, and on this condition it advances £160,000 to finish the float and dock; that the trust be remodelled, and placed under the direction of thirteen Commissioners, six to be elected by the ratepayers of Birkenhead, six by the rate-payers of Wallasey. Three by the dock boneholders, and the Government to have the right to nominate one who shall be Chairman of the Board. These proposals met with the concurrence of the Commissioners last week, and an answer to that effect was transmitted to [illegible]. The reply to which constituted the communication now read to be considered. The above propositions were accepted and substantially confirmed by the meeting, and the details will be published in a few days. An Act of Parliament will be required in order to enable the Commissioners to proceed with the works, and it is proposed that it shall be introduced as a Government measure. It is further proposed and agreed to by the Commissioners, that the Government appointed by the Government shall have the power of veto-ing the appointment of all the others. The preliminaries may now, therefore, be considered as definitively settled between the parties, and the works will be vigorously recommenced as soon as the Act of Parliament can be obtained.

The Amphion steam-frigate sailed on Thursday for Lisbon, carrying despatches for the Squadron.

SUICIDE OF A MERCHANT.—Mr. Payne, the Coroner for the City of London, received information, on Thursday, of the death of John Henry Peffell, Esq., who committed suicide under the following extraordinary circumstances:—The deceased gentleman, who was in the 70th year of his age, was a merchant, whose office was in Billiter-court, Billiter-street, City, and his private residence at No. 38, Upper Harley-street, Portland-place. He had recently become exceedingly despondent, and between ten and eleven o'clock he left home. In Wigmore-street he entered a chemist's and druggist's shop, and asked, in Latin, for some prussic acid, giving his name as Dr. Randell. The shopman, not having the slightest suspicion, took down the bottle from the shelf, when the deceased seized it directly, and drank a quantity of the contents. The persons in the shop failed to secure him, but he ran out as far as 108, Fore-street, where a surgeon was called, and the unfortunate gentleman was removed to the Cripplegate Dispensary. Every effort was made to expel the poison, but the deceased expired in a few minutes.

THE LATE MURDERS IN BIRMINGHAM.—Ann Wilkes, the woman committed for the murder of her four children on Saturday last, died in the Queen's Hospital on Thursday morning, at one o'clock. The children were interred the same day in St. Paul's Churchyard. The mother before death made a full confession of her guilt, stating that her unfortunate offspring died without a struggle.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SWITZERLAND

Private letters from Berne of the 24th inst. state that the federal representatives had completely failed in their mission to the Cantons of the League. They had been everywhere received by the Governments, but were not permitted to communicate with the people. Proclamations which had been sent to Berne were seized, and not allowed to circulate. Some disturbances had occurred in the Canton of St. Gall, which were supposed to have been fomented by Lucerne. They were, however, speedily suppressed by the energy of the authorities and the federal co-operation of Friburg, which sent two battalions into the disturbed districts. The Diet held an extraordinary sitting on the 24th, at which the decree of the Sonderbund refused to accept, was read, that on Sundays they were not in the habit of attending to the affairs of this world.

We read in a letter in the Débats, dated Berne, 22rd instant:—"The Catholics of St. Gall, Argau, of Geneva, and of Thurgau, are preparing petitions against war. The Conservatives declare that they will not march against the Sonderbund. In the meantime, the Diet has ordered that 60,000 men shall be placed under arms, to be divided into five divisions and six brigades."

The Journal des Débats adds a postscript dated the 24th, received by extraordinary express, announcing the resignation of M. Dufour, General of the Federal Army. The motive for his determination was unknown, but it appeared to be generally supposed he had accepted merely to obey what he considered a military duty, and that, after reflection, he declined the responsibility and the conduct of a war which he disapproves politically.

The Union Monarchique says:—"The Diet has suspended its sittings until the return of the federal representatives from the Cantons of the Sonderbund."

ITALY

The Neapolitan police, at Messina, having opened the despatches of the British Consul, he has apprised the British Admiral of the daring violation of his correspondence, after having in vain demanded satisfaction from the authorities.

The Alba of Florence states from private correspondence that warlike preparations are in progress at Modena. Proceeds in a preemptive state of defence. Three cannons have been sent to Reggio, and accommodations are preparing for a numerous body of Austrian troops, who appear to be shortly expected there.

AMERICA.

By the latest accounts brought by the Hibernia, the territory of Santa Fé was more tranquil, and reinforcements had arrived. Accounts from all parts of the United States and Canada represent the general prevalence of the potato rot. At least one half the crop has been destroyed, and many of the potatoes coming to market, although apparently sound and healthy, become rotten and worthless in three or four days. The grain crops in Canada are less than an average. On the other hand, the crop of cotton in the United States is represented as superabundant; there is, therefore, in the country, to lie over most of it till next spring, an immense surplus of wheat and corn. The New York Courier comments:—"Meantime, the country is quiet, prosperous, and little affected by war or by the commercial calamities of England."

THE MEDICAL PROFESSION.—On Wednesday, a numerous meeting of Poor-Law Surgeons and other gentlemen of the medical profession took place at the Hanover-square Rooms, for the purpose of adopting such measures as might be deemed expedient for bringing under the consideration of the Government the necessity of adequately remunerating the medical officers employed by the Boards of Guardians Dr. Burton, of Walsall, in the chair. Mr. T. Piers Healey, Hon. Secretary, read a long list of the various localities and unions in which meetings had been held, resolutions passed, and deputations appointed by the medical Poor-Law officers throughout the country, and stated that there was scarcely a union surgeon in the country that was not in communication with the gentlemen who were the principal promoters of the movement. Several gentlemen from different parts of the country addressed the meeting, and resolutions strongly condemnatory of the scanty and uncertain mode in which the medical officers were remunerated, and to the effect that the medical relief at present provided for the poor must be faulty and inadequate, with respect both to the patients and the public, as a necessary consequence of the errors of the system itself, were passed. A committee was appointed to collect and digest information, to memorialise the Government, and to communicate with the various Medical Corporations, in order to obtain their co-operation. Thanks having been voted to the Chairman, the meeting separated.

IMPROVEMENTS IN POSTAGE STAMPS.—The Post-office stamps having to be detached, either by cutting or tearing them from each other, great inconvenience is felt, particularly by those of extensive correspondence. A plan has been invented, by the aid of a machine, by which more than double the number of stamp sheets that are now annually required, may be so minutely indented in the direction of the white lines, as to allow the stamps to be instantly detached from the sheet without the operation of cutting. The contrivance will also enable purchasers to fold a sheet of stamps, or any less quantity, with unerring regularity, and in one-tenth of the time that is at present consumed in the operation.

MIDDLESEX HOUSE OF DETENTION.—This new prison for the reception of prisoners in the county of Middlesex, prior to their trial before a jury, was opened on Tuesday. It is under the control of Lieutenant Hill, who has been appointed Governor, under the control of the Visiting Justices. The building contains about 270 cells, and has been erected with the view of carrying out the system of separate confinement.

SHAKESPERE MEDAL. A medal, about the size of a crown-piece, has just been struck in bronze, to commemorate the first anniversary of Shakespere's house. The obverse bears the effigies of the poet, and the reverse, a view of the house in Henley street, Stratford-upon-Avon; beneath is the date of Shakespere's birth. The medal is an interesting memorial, and, except as to reputed likeness, is cleverly executed

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

ROBERT SMYTHE, ESQ., OF METHVEN CASTLE, CO. PERTH.

RECENT accounts from Scotland bring the intelligence of the death of this respected gentleman, a great landed proprietor in the county of Perth, and one of its Magistrates and Deputy-Lieutenants. He was son of the late David Smythe, titulary Lord Methven, by Elizabeth, his first wife, only daughter of Sir Robert Murray, Bart., of Hill Head, and represented the ancient family of Smythe of Braco, which was founded by Thomas Smythe, a distinguished Physician of his day, and Apothecary to King James III. of Scotland. Traditionally, the Smythes of Methven trace their origin to the famous Clan Chattan, being descended, it is asserted, from Neil Cromb, third son of Murdoch, of that Clan, who flourished in the time of William the Lion. Mr. Robert Smythe, whose death we record, was born 10th Feb., 1778, and married twice. His first wife was Mary, daughter of James Townsend Oswald, Esq., of Dunnekier, Co. Fife, and his second, Susan Renton, eldest daughter of Sir Alexander Muir Mackenzie, Bart., but by neither had he any issue. His estates devolve, consequently, on his half-brother, William Smythe, Esq., now of Methven Castle.

SIR HENRY BROMLEY HINRICH, KNIGHT.

SIR HENRY, whose death occurred on the 19th inst., aged fifty-five, was son of Charles Robert Hinrich, Esq., by his wife, Anne Charlotte Thwaits. The honour of Knighthood he received 18th September, 1831, at the coronation of William IV., being then Lieutenant of the Band of Gentlemen-at-Arms. He married, in 1823, Miss Eliza Susanna Dent, and had issue two sons and five daughters. The worthy Knight resided, chiefly, at Bisham Cottage, near Marlow, Bucks.

MAJOR-GENERAL THOMAS STAUNTON ST. CLAIR, C.B. AND K.H.

This distinguished officer died at his residence, Gloucester-road, Hyde-park, on the 23d inst., aged sixty. He was youngest brotuer of Captain David Latimer St. Clair, R.N., of Staverton Court, county Gloucester, being son of the late Colonel William St. Clair, a descendant of the ancient Scottish family of St. Clair.

COUNTRY NEWS

MURDER OF FOUR CHILDREN BY THEIR MOTHER.

A horrible event, forcibly suggesting remembrances of the tragedy of Steinberg, occurred at Birmingham on Saturday morning. A wretched woman, known by the name of Ann Wilkes, who for the last five months kept a small shop in the Cheapside, for the sale of cigars, has murdered her four helpless children under circumstances so appalling that the records of human crime and madness may be searched long for a parallel. The attention of the neighbours was first attracted by the shutters of this little shop not being taken down at the usual hour in the morning of Saturday; and, when noon had passed, the windows still remained closed, and no answer being returned from within to repeated knockings, a person named Edwards, living near the spot, placed a ladder against the window of the first floor, and thus obtained an entrance into the house. On proceeding to an upper room a hideous and revolting spectacle met his gaze—the mother extended on the floor with her throat cut, yet still alive! Beside her, was her youngest infant—dead; and near by, on a truckle bed, lay three other children, all stone dead, with their throats cut. Medical assistance having been obtained, the woman was conveyed to the Queen's Hospital.

THE INQUEST.

On Monday the Coroner's Jury was empanelled at the Commissioners Rooms, in Moor-street, Birmingham, to enquire into the facts briefly related above. After being sworn, the Jury proceeded to view the bodies at the house in Cheapside, and on their return the evidence was produced. A man of the premises was laid before the Coroner, exhibiting the exact position in which the unfortunate children lay

The first witness examined was Edward Alfred Banks, tailor, of 38, Sherlock-street, brother-in-law to Ann Wilkes, the mother of the four children. He had always been given to understand that her name was Ann Wilkes, but he believed there was a person to prove she had not been married.

The Coroner said he must ascertain the name of the parties before proceeding further.

George Hodgson was then called, and he said he believed her name was Ann Green. The father of the deceased children was Henry Wilkes; he was brother to his (witness's) wife. The mother of the deceased children always went by the name of Ann Wilkes, and he should like that she was not married, and consequently her name was Ann Green. He had occasion, after the death of Henry Wilkes, to see her respecting a property question, and he asked her name and she told him it was Green. He produced a letter written to Wilkes.

Mr. Banks's evidence resumed. He knew the four murdered children. John Henry, ten years of age, was the eldest; Mary Jane Maria, seven years of age, the second eldest; William Charles, six years of age, was the third; and Frederick George, four years of age, the youngest. After all he had heard, he still believed the mother's name was Ann Wilkes. He was married in the family nine years, and never heard she was by any other name except Ann Wilkes's friends. He had heard Mr Hodgson said some time ago she was not married.

Margaret Fisher deposed that, on Friday night last, she was at the house of the mother of the four children, in the parlour, sitting on the hearth-rug, playing on the hearth. She did not observe anything particular about the mother, and the conversation throughout was unimportant.

Elizabeth Herring, of the Crescent, Cheapside, deposed that, on Friday night, about ten o'clock, Ann Wilkes came to her house, and purchased a quarter of sixpenny ale, which was an unusually large quantity for her. The White Horse is nearly opposite the prisoner's house. Ann Wilkes, but she (witness) did not observe any company in her house that night.

Wm Edwards deposed to having entered the house, by means of a ladder, in consequence of the shutters being still closed at late as half-past one on Saturday, and described the position in which he found the woman and her murdered children.

Edward Weldings, of the Birmingham police, generally confirmed the evidence of the preceding witness; and Banks, upon being recalled, deposed to the distress and embarrassment which the deceased had suffered, and to her unsuccessful efforts in trade. He also described her despondency and state of mind, and said that she had threatened suicide rather than endure destitution.

Several other witnesses were examined, including the mother of the unfortunate woman. The evidence, however, was not of any interest.

Mr. Sands Cox, Professor of Anatomy in the Queen's College, Birmingham, gave medical evidence as to the wounds; and with respect to the state of the prisoner's mind since the event, he said—"I have seen her on several times, when she was calm and placid. She answered simple questions which I put to her coherently, but I did not ask her many."

The Rev. J. C. Miller, Rector of St. Martin's, Birmingham, was about to give evidence, having visited the prisoner in the hospital, but upon his saying that nothing had occurred between them which would lead him to suppose that she was convinced she would immediately die—that she was devoid of all hope in this world, the Coroner decided that his evidence could not be received.

The Jury, after a minute's consideration, returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder against Ann Wilkes," and she accordingly stands committed to take her trial at the next Assizes for the county of Warwick.

CESSATION OF LABOUR IN THE MANUFACTURING DISTRICTS.—The threatened general strike has proved a failure. An aggregate meeting was to have been held at Hyde, on Monday, which was to have been attended by the whole of the working classes of the district, including Hyde, Gee-cross, Stalybridge, Ashton, Dukinfield, Oldham, Rurst, Mossley, Stockport, &c., and the parties were to assemble in their respective towns, at an early hour in the morning, and march in procession to the Market-places in each town, where they were to meet at ten o'clock. The object was to produce an entire cessation of factory work in the whole of those districts. The news of this determination soon reached the authorities of the respective towns, and immediate steps were taken to suppress any breach of the peace that might be attempted. At Oldham there was to be a meeting, at six o'clock, on a plot of ground, from which the mob was to march to Hyde, but, as the hour named, there were but more than a dozen boys and some three or four men present. No one offered to speak for some time, until one of the boys mounted upon Mr. Mellor, the chief constable, who was on the spot, do take the chair. This gave rise to a laugh, and the whole thing was treated as a joke, and the few persons who had assembled immediately retired to their homes. At Stockport every attempt to get up a meeting failed, and not an operative left work. At Ashton and Dukinfield, being the places where the masters had determined to reduce the wages 8 per cent, all the hands ran stand out except at Messrs. Whittaker's mill, where the operatives accepted the reduction. At ten, on Monday, the turn-outs held a meeting on a vacant plot of land, but the only business done was to order that they should march to Hyde, to meet the workmen from Stockport and other towns. About 200 of them set off and quietly walked along the road, until they arrived at the Market-place, where, to their astonishment, they was not a single individual assembled. After remaining in the streets for nearly an hour, a meeting was held in a small room in a beer-house; but, after waiting for some time, they were informed that the people of Stockport could not be prevailed upon to turn out as a body; and that, therefore, the object of the movement did not think it advisable to form a procession to march to Hyde. In the meantime a deputation from the Ashton spinners was appointed to wait on the masters of Hyde, to request them to cease working until the affair at Ashton was settled. Thus, after three days' active exertions on the part of the leaders, ended the universal strike in twenty-four towns, as agreed upon in former resolutions of the delegates. The general impression is, that there will be no general turn-out. At present, it is confined to Ashton, where the reduction was offered.

HER ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCESS HELENA.—SKETCHED AT WINDSOR.

THE PRINCE OF WALES, PRINCESS ROYAL, AND PRINCESS HELENA, IN THE PARK OF WINDSOR.

Two fresh home-pictures of the pleasant time
Of pretty Childhood—making Royal play
With youthful opportunity—and off
To brace the limb and catch the breezy gale,
And woo the sportive Autumn to be kind
To its bright beauty and its gamesome health!
There is a loveliness in every phase
Of Childhood's growing Life—an int'rest rife
With gushing innocence and tender joy—
A catching charm that flows and spreads itself
Over the spirit of the Looker on,
And wooes him to Companionship and Love.
The Sight of Infancy is like the link
That binds us to the pure and only time
When we were sinless:—so in every land,
In every guise and rank—whether the blossom
Be lowliest violet or of Regal rose—
CHILDHOOD is impress'd as among the fairest
And holiest gleams of Life!
Here it has presence
Beyond the personal and spirited lure
Of its own beauty; here it woos the gaze
As symbol of a dear and national hope
And, as from th' Heaven of FUTURE shineth out
Stars in her book of England's destiny!
The grand old Castle crowning Windsor's Slopes,
And smiling, from its hale and hilly brow,
Over the broadlands of its boundless park,
Watches the gambols of our Royal Race,
And blends the lovely prospects of the hour
With proud Ancestral Memories of the Past!
The turreted old Palace, that hath gone
Through such a wilderness of Wild Romance,
May well be deemed imbued with power of thought,
And fancifully held to charm its heart
With some of the great dramas of the days
Of which it stood the theatre. It alone
Unmoved and motionless thro' all the lapse
Of Royalty that died beneath its dome!
But if along with Thought it could awake
The Strength of Contrast, and with Memoried Past
Match the bright Consciousness of present hope,
Know of the better time that blesses it;
Talk to its gallerted Kings—and tell plain truth
Of sympathy and happiness that reign
To-day between the People and the Throne—
To try a parity of bliss inferred,
It might be glad to gaze upon its parks,
And see the young pets of the present hour,
Frisking their happiness along its lawns!
Nay, if Old Windsor's walls are senseless things—
Have no enchantment in them—cannot boast
Of Herne the Hunter's brains—and know not halt
As much of History as they do of Storm;
Still they have have tenants full of earnest hope,
Anxious with wisdom, and with hearts alive
To every beat and throb of Nature's pulse!
Thence a dear Queen and Mother gazes down
In happy pride upon her little ones;
Blesses the beauty of her lovely girls,
And sees a young King in her buoyant boy!
Thence her proud Consort (her's and England's choice,)
And well confirming both their choice and love,)
Partakes with her the sweet parental joy;
While the unconscious children ride away,
Not knowing how their blythe contented ways
Are blessing those who watch them!
Could a score
Of Britain's millions rush into that park,
Climb its old trees, and stand among the boughs,
There would be hats waved like a hurricane;
And the loud voices of their heart-halloos
Would make Old Windsor, and half England more,
Ring with their echoes of "God save the Queen,"
"Honour Prince Albert"—"Bless the Prince of Wales!"
And then the Princess Royal's name would blend
With that of her young sister's—till the voice
Of the Land's Loyalty should make the Soul
Of the Land's Royalty more happy still!

THEIR ROYAL HIGHNESSES THE PRINCE OF WALES AND THE PRINCESS ROYAL, AT WINDSOR.

M O S Q U I T I A.

A FAMILY OF WOOLWA INDIANS ON THE BLUEFIELDS RIVER.

THE spirit of enterprise inherent in the Anglo-Saxon race has extended the influence of Great Britain far beyond the bounds of her colonial empire, insomuch that it reigns paramount in places hitherto scarcely known to the generality of her population.

Among these, Mosquitia, or, as it is commonly called, the Mosquito Shore, affords more than ordinary interest, not less from its position and natural productions, than its former possession by, and present attachment to, this country.

Situated to the south of the Bay of Honduras, and forming the western shore of that of Guatemala, its position is central with respect to the trade of the West Indies, Mexico, and the United States, as well as that of Southern America. It consists for the most part of Table Land, nearly 5000 feet above the level of the sea, backed by the mountainous range in which are the famous gold and silver mines of Costa Rica, on the south, and Honduras on the north.

The soil is remarkably fertile, producing two, and sometimes three crops of corn, and grapes annually; sugar, indigo, tobacco, cocoa, and cotton, may be cultivated to any extent; mahogany of the largest size, and logwood abound, and cochineal is found in great quantity. The climate is salubrious, excepting in the uncultivated lowlands on the coast. It has several navigable rivers and excellent harbours. Fish are taken in profusion both in the fresh and salt waters, and the abundance of turtle led Mr. Gunter to select it as the most suitable locality for his establishment for preserving the flesh of that desire of epicures.

To this much favoured country the aboriginal inhabitants retired after they had been driven from other parts by the Spaniards. Here they have maintained themselves in a rude independence under the rule of the head of the Mosquito tribe; but after the conquest of Jamaica by Cromwell, they, prompted by an ancient friendship, which had originated in the time of the Buccaneers, in the reign of Charles the Second, placed themselves under the protection of England, and acted as allies against the Spaniards. During the war of 1739, the trade of this country had become so important that it was determined to hold it under the immediate sovereignty of Great Britain; and a superintendent was appointed, who erected a fort, hoisted the national flag, and a settlement being formed on the Black River, a clergyman was sent out under the auspices of the Venerable Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Yet, notwithstanding the European population had risen to near 1400 in number, though not till after much debate—ceded to Spain in 1778, and, in consequence, abandoned.

The Spaniards, however, being offensive to the native population, were never able to obtain any footing in the country; and since that time the ruling Chief, with the title of King, has been under the protection of the British Government, and been crowned at Jamaica or Balize by its officials, in Church and State.

The present King, George Augustus Frederic, was crowned at the latter place by the Rev. Mr. Newport, Commissary to the Bishop of Jamaica, in the presence of Colonel Fancourt, Superintendent, and Patrick Walker, Esq., Agent and Consul-general for the British Government, at the Mosquito Shore, on the 7th May, 1845, being then about fifteen years old.

The drawing represents the King in Council, his pages behind him; on his right, P. Walker, Esq.; on his left, George Hodgson, Commandant at Bluefields; and at the bottom of the table sits Captain Watson, a gentleman educated in the naval service of the East India Company, but who last year crossed the Atlantic in his yacht, about forty tons burthen, and has settled in the country—the little vessel now bearing the Mosquitian flag under his command.

Mosquitia may contain above 40,000 square miles, and its coast is considerably over 400 miles in length; the claim of its Monarch to the whole extent, from Cape Cameroon to the Chiriqui Lagoon, is considered tenable; although the Spanish geographers place its southern limit at St. Juan de Nicaragua, on the river so lately seized by Prince Louis Napoleon as the most eligible by which to connect the Atlantic with the Pacific.

The population may be about 20,000. At Bluefields, where alone Europeans are now settled, there are 300 Creoles and Browns, and 400 Negroes to 120 European settlers of the United States.

There are sixteen native tribes, the principal of which are the Sanchos, on the coast from Black River to Pearl Key Lagoon; the Valientes about the Chiriqui Lagoon, though these have suffered most from the tyranny of the Spaniards; and the Woolwas, on the Bluefields River. They are an intelligent but indolent race, all their wants being supplied by the abundant and spontaneous produce of the earth, its woods and waters, as appears from the accompanying Sketch.

The present Resident, Mr. Walker, has used great exertions to promote the welfare of this country, and open it to British commerce; but, partly on account of the failure of former ill arranged and mendacious schemes of colonisation, as yet, without great success. The citizens of the United States are also, as usual, making very effort to monopolise it; but the settlement of Mr. Watson promises well for the future, as does that of a body of Prussian emigrants who arrived last autumn.

The people are anxious for instruction of every kind, and a schoolmaster has been sent from Jamaica; but, although land has been appropriated by the will of the late King for the establishment of the Church of England, and both on the part of the Head of Ruatan they are willing to contribute largely towards the maintenance of a clergyman, they are as yet wanting the offices and sacraments of our holy religion. This deficiency is supplied, in so far as is possible, by Mr. Walker, who, with his lady, deserves the highest commendation for his labours to improve the moral and social condition of the people, and endear the young King for the station to which, by the providence of God, he has been called.

THE WINTER FASHIONS.

(Abridged from "Berger's Ladies' Gazette of Fashion.")

The Winter Fashions have appeared in unusual variety and splendour. We never recollect so many novelties in every department of the toilette, as our Paris this month exhibits. Not only have we obtained patterns of all the most elegant Parisian costumes and of the dresses to be worn by the ladies of Ten among our own aristocracy, but we have also obtained a pattern of the winter dress of our beloved Queen. We will describe the Royal Promenade Dress; and then give our usual summary of the Fashions for the month. The Royal chagrain is of green satin, a close shape, the back ornamented with black lace draperies; a cluster of green ostrich aigrets are disposed at the bottom of it, on each side. The dress is a robe redingote of pink gros d'Hiver, a high corsage, and full sleeves. The Royal pardessus is of puce coloured velvet, lined with white satin, and trimmed with broad bands of ermine; it is a three-quarter length, high and close at the neck, with a large collar of very small bows, trimmed with ermine. We have presents with the Misses of the Month.

Chapeaux and Capotes.—There is little alteration in the forms of; the brims are closer, and the crowns are round and low. Feathers are in favour for velvet chapeaux, with the addition of a black lace drapery or vellette. Satin, velours epingle, and velvet, are the favourite materials.

Mantles, Mantelets, and Pardessuses, we have so many elegant novelties in, that we hardly know which most to recommend. We have seen some very elegant mantles made of velvet, trimmed with satin, and lined with ruby or emerald green satin; they are quilted all round; the corners of the fronts are rounded, and the mantle is short, and trimmed with broad lace or deep fringe. Very pelerine, rounded at the top, and covering the arms, is terminated by long narrow ends, which are trimmed to correspond with the bands of the dress, and finished with a broad cellature. Velvet, satin, and cashmere, keep their ground for hardessuses.

Robes.—Silks, satins, and poplins, are the favourite materials; shot silks are also employed in some instances. The pensee form is most in vogue. Many of those for the morning promenade are less trimmed than usual. Garnitures, in half-dress, are numerous, and we observe considerable novelty in those of passementerie. The franges Sevillennes are employed both for redingotes and robes.

The forms of dresses are very little changed from the last month. Sleeves are much in favour for négligé. Silks and cashmere are employed far half-dress, trimmed with passementerie or velvet. Shot silks seem likely to resume their vogue, particularly for dinner dress, also bufetas. Satins and satin are in request for evening robes. The corsages low, deeply pointed, and the majority flat; the garnitures generally lace flounces. Others are trimmed with blonde lace of the colour of the robe. Demitoilettes of coloured blonde are also employed.

Coiffures.—Caps lose nothing of their vogue for dinner dress, and social parties. The most novel are of application de Bruxelles, trimmed with geraniums; others are of tulle, entirely bobbinnée, without ribbons, flowers, or any ornament except floating barbes of tulle.

Passementerie will be much employed for evening coiffures, and dinners of ceremony. Among the most remarkable is the application de tulle, of silk net trimmed with a chou and falling fringe; it is a mixture of a striking colour, with gold or silver.

Colours.—The new colours are purple, orange, puce, shade of grey, crimson, fawn, groseille, violet, and different shades of green.

Furs.—Sable and ermine lose nothing of their vogue. Mink comes next to sable. Imitation sable will also be used. Kolinski is also in vogue, and grey squirrel for young ladies. The Victorines have given way to the Queen's or riding boa, these are either cut to the shape of the neck, or made quite straight; both sides are of fur, and their length is about a yard and three quarters. They are worn with cuffs to correspond; muffs to match will appear later in the season. Very deep fur cardinals will also be very fashionable; they must be a yard deep at the least. The Witzchoura will be used as an evening wrap, but lead to the exclusion of cloaks of a smaller size. Real or imitation ermine will always be adopted for the Witzchoura. Grey or fancy squirrel, Kolinski, and other furs for smaller cloaks.

LITERATURE.

The Doctor. Vol. VII. Longman and Co.

Soon after the publication of this work was commenced, its main drift was described to be "to strengthen and revive the genuine old English feelings and tastes." This oracular opinion was given some dozen years since, and, incontestably, there has been during this interval a very considerable reaction in a kindred direction. It is not worth while to attempt to define what portion "The Doctor" has contributed to this change; but, the dropping of a volume, occasionally, must, to some extent, have cherished the "feelings and tastes."

We are not quite sure that the right understanding of the work has been extensive which its acceptation by the public. By some it has been regarded as immense trifling; and all its accompaniments, the author himself included, as the middle of the present volume, when he says: "egregious" is his mistaken who supposes that this book consists of nothing more than

Some Dr. Long's sense, and dregs of scattered thought.

He than says more as that he has carefully selected for the reader verba deiderii, recitations, et versus: and in the next page, he contemptuously adds "make up your mind to find them all in this chapter."

By another set of readers the work has been reputed merely a mere compounding of lip-wisdom, a string of piquant quotations—the pure ore of the author's setting being evidently overlooked in such estimates of "the Doctor's" production. It is true that it is rich to excess in anecdotes of rare pleasantry and body-speech, in quaint illustrations of and read acquaintance with the rarities of our olde literature; yet, the aptitude, ingenuity, and learning evinced in the application of this wealth is manifest in every page of "the Doctor's" own writing. Of the long trails of beautiful thought, the refined disquisitions, and the snatches of exquisite wit and humour, with which Southey has illuminated the volumes of "the Doctor," as well as the rich stores which he has garnered from rare and eloquent books, into these pages, the reader need scarcely be reminded; and so, lest no be "Unmasyred," we will proceed to show how far the present volume attains to the character of its predecessors.

The seventh, then, is the close of the work; and the editor, the worthy vicar of West Tarring, informs us that the present volume contains "all that it is thought advisable to publish of the Papers and Fragments for the Doctor, &c." From such discursive materials it will not be difficult to select a pleasant column. The first and second chapters are occupied by a disquisition upon Tongues. Towards the close of the latter the author drily observes,

"If were better to be remembered as Bayes than remembered Petrus Carmilianus, because of the profound obscurity in which this pitiful poet was buried. Than thus to be thought worthy of being remembered for having predicted the Dutch fleet, that deserved to be forgotten. There is, or was, an officer of the Exchequer called Carmelian Nihility, or Clerk of the Nihils. If there were a High Court of Literature with such an officer on the establishment, he would be a sinecure office for him in these, or in any days, to register the names of those authors who have written to no purpose, and the titles of those books from which nothing is to be learnt."

"More harm is done to public life by the reticence of well-informed men, than by the loquacity of fools; more by the timidity and caution of those who desire at heart the good of their country, than by the audacity of those who labour to overthrow its constitution. It was said in the days of old, that 'a man full of words shall not prosper upon the earth.' Mane nost avons changé tout cela. Even in literature, a leafy style, if there be any fruit under the foliage, is preferable to a knotty one, however fine the grain. Whipt cream is a good thing; and better still when it comes and adorns that amiable combination of sweetmeats and ratafia cakes soaked in wine, to which Cowper labelled the delightful poem, when he described the 'Task.'"

The two succeeding chapters are, in the staple, the inquiry of that good old divine, Adam Littleton—whether a man and himself were two, and his reply, that "every man is made up of three Egos."

The Equality of the Sexes and the Importance of Woman, are the subjects of the two next chapters. The former question was much discussed some years since. The Doctor is a waverer; but, the mention of the first transgression enables him to quote "an Apology for Eve by one of her Daughters, yea, an Apology for her, and a Defence, showing that she acted meritoriously in eating the Apple." The Lady's new heresy is that the Serpent tempted the Woman by assuring her that if she ate the Apple, she should not surely die, but be as Gods; hence, she makes the motive great, virtuous, and irresistible; the novelty consisting in the temptation being addressed to the understanding, but the succeeding generations as a great and meritorious act. Here are a few of the curiosities of the succeeding chapter:—

"There are, indeed, certain Rabbis who affirm that Eve was not taken out of Adam's side; but that Adam and herself were created, with a tail (pendix) agreeing with the well-known theory of Lord Monboddo); and that, among the various experiments and improvements which were made in his form and organization before he was finished, the tail was removed as an inconvenient appendage, and of the excrescence or superfluous part whence was then kept off, the Woman was formed.

"There is another legend relating to a like but even less worthy formation of the first helpmate, and this is also ascribed to the Rabbis. According to this mythos, the rib which had been taken from Adam was for a moment laid down, and in that moment a serpent stole it, and ran off with it at full speed. Adam pursued, and though not in league with the Monkey he could have been no good Angel; for, overtaking him, he caught him by the Tail, brought it maliciously back instead of the Rib, and of that Tail, was Woman made. What became of the Rib, with which the Monkey got clear off, was never to mortal known.' However, the Doctor admitted that, on the whole, the received opinion was the more probable. And during this admission, he related an anecdote of Lady Jekyl., who was fond of puzzling herself and others with such questions as had been common enough a generation before her, in the days of the Athenian Oracle. She asked William Whitest of he remembered anything in memory, one day, at her husband's table, to resolve a difficulty which occurred to her in the Mosaic account of the creation. 'Since it pleased God, Sir,' said she, 'to create the Woman, who of all things, was the first that he took rib rather than any other part?' Whiston scratched his head, and answered, 'Indeed, Madam, I do not know, unless it be that the rib is the most crooked part of the body.' 'There!' said her husband, 'you have it now: I hope you are satisfied!'

"The Hungarians, thinking it inhumane for a nation to be governed by a woman—and yet grossly paying their homage to the Queen of Hungary—resolved, when the Crown fell to a female, they called her King Mary, instead of Queen. And Queen Elizabeth, rather than be accounted of the feminine gender, assumed it as her prerogative to be of all things, 'A prime officer with a White Staff.' 'True,' replied the Queen, 'yet I never gave you your office so absolutely, it that I still reserved myself of the Quorum.' 'Of the Quorum, Madam,' returned the Lord, presuming somewhat too far upon her favour. Whereat she snatched the staff in some anger out of his hand, and told him 'he should acknowledge her of the Quorum Quorum Quorum, before he had it again.'"

This banter upon Woman, and of Women, traces well the Gossip Feminine; the following Ladies of the Stocking agreeing in the sentence of condemnation:

"There is Mrs. Lapis Lazuli, and her daughter, Miss Ultramarine, there is Mrs. Buestone, the most camelot of female critics, and her friend, Miss Gentian, —Heaven preserve us! the blueness of her complexion—there is Lady Turquoise, Lady Celestina Sky, the widow Bluebeard, Miss Mazarine, and that pratty creature, Serena Cerulean—it does me good to look on her, she is the blue-bell of the party. There is Miss Prussia, Mrs. Prussian, Mrs. Indigo, and the Widow Woad. And Heaven knows who beside."

We, we, however, perceive that we seriously incur the displeasure of small critics, "who never will be pleased with their own food, like ducks in the water, but never purify themselves in clear streams, nor take to the deep waters."

The metempsychosis in a descending scale as a scheme of punishment, is thus glanced at:

"He assured [illegible] that no Judge ever pronounced a more just decision than the three Infernal Lord Chancellors of the dead would do, if they [illegible] and [illegible] to [illegible] to [illegible] to

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"H. B. B." The first position is somewhat too easy. The second is wrong; for, upon White taking the knight, Kessering check on his first move, Black may interpose his Queen, and thus keep the mate. Be not discouraged, however; you can do better yet.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

To-day brings to a conclusion the racing year of 1847—at least, the so considered legitimate turf season. It has been one which—like all human affairs and institutions—was not without its crosses and, the mischances of the time taken into account, its fair share of good luck also. We shall, at no distant day, bestow upon it a Parthian hit—in form of a summary or retrospect; in the meanwhile contenting ourselves, in this brief allusion to its closing meeting, with a few observations on the most important event of the occasion. As the Cesarewitch handicap to the second October week is the Cambridgeshire of that ilk to the Houghton. The latter meeting, from the circumstance of its being the last and only opportunity for making use of the miscellaneous inmates of the stables, is distinguished for populous fields. We, therefore, predicted last week a very large start for its chief handicap—the result was the greatest ever known at Newmarket. The very general interest which attaches to the principal racing events of the season -in consequence of the very general taste for turf specula tion is one shape or other—has led to the practice of anticipating their issues in sporting essays. Without offering any opinion upon that custom, we may venture to quote the two latest instances of its application.

The Cesarewitch and Cambridgeshire Stakes this year were won by two of the extremest outsiders of the ring. The "talents" curled up their noses at Gawrush, and looked upon the poor old Widow as if she herself were the defunct subject of the coal. The pair of unmatchables won their respective races in such style as Childers or Eclipse might not have disdained; and why not? If weight can bring horses together—as who says it cannot—is not a handicap the unfairest on which this effect is to be brought about? Among gamesters there has long prevailed a passion for some ideal system—which, being perserved in, should insure its disciples success; but the wildest fanatics of fortune never fancied that there existed a single cast of the dice which afforded the player a better chance of "throwing in" than half-a-dozen, or half-a-score. Now hazard an I handicap races are, or ought to be, alike in this; both are essentially matters of chance-swindler. But in "mats" in the former being called and thrown, the odds are for or against the player; while in the latter, the acceptances being declared, their number tells for or against the fieldmen. Calculating on large starts for the two great autumnal handicaps, we said, "Back the fields." How startling that counsel was, the facts have shown.

At the "regular" monthly meeting of the Royal Thames Yacht Club, to be held on Thursday next, the inquiry into the charges of smuggling said to be pending in the Court of Exchequer against a member of the Club will be resumed. It is stated that the Duc de Stacpole admits having removed a considerable quantity of brandy from his yacht to his cellars ashore, but pleads that it was done openly and in ignorance of its being any infringement of the Excise Laws. The Duc has written to the Secretary of the R.T.Y.C., requesting that his name may be erased from the list of members. The propriety of acceding to that desire will be taken into consideration; not, of course, in reference to the abstract matter of it, but to the manner in which the resignation shall be received.

FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MUNICH, Oct. 15.*

Fine weather, the late Volksfest, and the return of the Court, have contributed to make this city much more gay of late than it has been for some time past. I confess I am often astonished that more English do not permanently reside here. Thousands of English families, to whom economy is an object, are to be found in other places on the Continent, where living is dearer, and there are not so many objects to interest the mind; but here, where a man can live for £80 a-year, and enjoy life for £100—where there are works of art enough to occupy a lover of the arts for ever—where, during the greater part of the year, the finest music is to be had almost for nothing, and there is a perpetual scope for amusement—where a good lodging may be had for 12s. a-month, and a man can live at an hotel, breakfast, dine, sup, drink his bottle of wine, and sleep, for 8s. a-day, and have his stall at the Opera for 1s. 8d. a-night, there are comparatively few of our economising countrymen, who rather frequent the more expensive cities and towns in the neighbourhood of the Rhine, or flock to those places where gambling is the chief business of life. I can perfectly well understand a man preferring to live in Paris, because there, if he can command sufficient money, he can also obtain a more continual enjoyment. It is true, that at Munich you must, in a great measure, seek your amusement; while in Paris, it is forced upon you at every turn: but it is also true that a man can enjoy all the amusements of Munich, and be in a condition to move in good society, upon an income of one-fourth or one-fifth of that which will procure him a similar position in Paris, or even in Brussels. However, every one to his taste.

Yesterday, and the day before, there has been going on a ceremony here, to which we have nothing similar in England. Wednesday, the 13th, was the anniversary of the death of the late King of Bavaria, the father of the present Sovereign, Maximilian I. It has been the custom to mark the day by a procession of a religious character, which strongly illustrates the loyalty of the Bavarian people, and the manner in which personal respect for their King is mixed up with their political and social system. For the last two-and-twenty years it has been the custom to mark the national respect for the memory of the late Sovereign by one of the most imposing ceremonies of the Church which speaks to the soul through the medium of the senses, and whose aim it is to keep the minds of its votaries in a sort of ecstasy by the aid of the powers of art. By nine or half-past nine in the morning the bells of the different churches tolled a funeral peal, and crowds of people might be seen hurrying in the direction of the St. Michael's Church, where the ceremony was to take place. Detachments of the five different regiments quartered in Munich also made their way to the church a fine old building in the Rococo style of architecture. On entering the church I saw with how much art, and with what an eye to effect, everything that could enhance the solemnity of the occasion had been used. Every one who had the arrangement of the interior. You must imagine a lofty chapel, more fitly to be termed a cathedral, rich in Italian carving of garlands, fruits, and flowers, and crowded with statuary and gilding. The high altar, the stalls, and the numerous minor altars of the church, were all hung with palls of black velvet; and, in the centre of the choir, immediately opposite the high altar, was a catafalk, raised on steps to a considerable altitude, over which a magnificent black velvet pall, embroidered with gold, hung from the ceiling by a canopy at the top, and descending in four long black streams to each corner of the choir. Before the pall was formed a triangle composed by innumerable wax candles, and all around, in every niche and corner, were more lights, clustered like stars in the heavens. These, gleaming and sparkling on the black velvet, and their brilliancy heightened by the windows and doors of the church being all darkened, reflected again upon the bright shields and armour hung up on all sides around, and also in the curasses of the soldiers, and the magnificent gold and silver robes of the officiating priests, produced an almost magical effect. Coming into the church from the daylight, it seemed like some vast subterranean temple, or one of those mysterious scenes one sees in dreams, grand and indistinct. Round the coffin a guard of honour was stationed, composed of picked men from the various regiments. These, at a signal from without, presented arms; and the King, accompanied by Prince Luitpold and Prince Adalbert, entered their stalls, followed by a suite of Generals, Colonels, &c., in full uniform. The body-guard of the King, dressed in their singular old Spanish costume, and armed with halberds, then took their station in front of the altar; and the intermediate space was filled with officers of cuirassiers and other regiments, whose ample white cloaks, and flashing helmets with their sable plumes, formed a group not ill in keeping with the rest of the scene in the interior of the Church. Soon after the King's entrance, the officiating Bishop, in full dress of black and gold, issued from the vestry into the choir, ushered by the acolytes, and followed by the canons of the church, also in full robes, and by a body of archbishops in their brown habits. The Bishop's entrance was the signal for two bands of regimental music (stationed in the organ-loft) to commence playing the music of the mass, the responses being accompanied by two other bands stationed in the choir. In England we cannot reconcile ourselves to the idea of anything but an organ for sacred music; but it would be difficult to conceive anything much more grand or imposing than the effect of their music, heard under such circumstances; swelling up the lofty aisles, and echoing in the higher galleries, that it seemed lost in space, as though it had borne upon it to heaven the prayers it was meant to express in sounds and thoughts more beautiful and devout than human language can convey. The mass was celebrated with all the solemnity which characterises the Roman Catholic Church. The vocal music was given by the choristers of the King's Chapel, assisted by the chief singers of the opera; and as the interest might be heard the low monotonous chanting of the priest officiating at the high altar, responded to by the canons at intervals, or the tinkling of the bells at the raising of the Host. The King paid devout attention throughout. He is a man of a highly poetical mind, and one on which such scenes produce a strong impression; and the ceremony altogether, which hundreds of the people took part, was one which can only be seen in a country governed on the despotic principle, where, whatever may be the faults of the ruler, he at least makes himself up with the people, and, in profession at least, shares with them his joys and his sorrows. The whole ceremony lasted about an hour, at the expiration of which time, the King and the Court and their respective retired in state as they had come Yesterday, a ceremony of a similar kind took place in the Theatine Church, which requiem was chanted in the presence of the King and the Royal Family.

As it to form a contrast with the foregoing, on Wednesday, being the anniversary of the Queen's marriage with the King, and yesterday being the anniversary of her birth, music was performed by regimental bands in the public squares, and the people rejoiced and feasted much.

Politics are making more stir here than usual. The Chambers recently voted an address to the King, full of the most liberal views demanding, in short, rights which, if granted at once, would paralyse the Government, and be tantamount to a revolution. The Chambers have met to vote money for the railroad. They have commenced the business; but, taking a lesson from Charles the First's Parliament, they are going to discuss their grievances before they vote the money. To-morrow (Saturday) the first debate comes on, on the question of the liberty of the press. There will be a good deal of excitement, and a good deal of ill-will; but, in the present state of Bavaria, the movement is premature, more especially as the King, with the Countess of Landsfeld always urging him forward, is decidedly disposed to advance with the times, and these things are better done by concessions of free will than when yielded to force.

Prince Napoleon was at present the Chevalier Bayard, a native of Bavaria, who has spent twenty years of active and arduous travel, often attended by serious danger, in the interior of South America, whence he has returned with some thousands of most valuable original sketches. He is already somewhat known by the praises of Von Humboldt. It is to be hoped the King may purchase his collection, which would form a valuable addition to others he has here. By the way, an Englishman visiting Munich, should not neglect to see the unique collection of Etruscan and other antiquities, in the lower chamber of the Pinacothek or; a similar collection of general curiosities which may be heard of on inquiry in the Basaar, in the Hofgasten.

ILLUSTRATED LITERATURE.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK FOR 1848.

This is a more attractive year-book than either of its predecessors: it is richer in illustration, and, altogether, more original, in its artistic as well as its literary contents. The pencil of Mr. Kenny Meadows has contributed "the Heads of the Months," which are characteristically effective. Next, we have a set of charming illustrations of "Country Scenes" a large and picturesque subject, with a small piece, for each month. Each bears the impress of the individuality of the natural climatology, with the natural appearances of the season, and the monthly phases of the farmer's life. Thus, in January, the ground is white and thickly clothed with snow, the effect of which, against the black wintry sky, and the bare bough trees, is very telling; the scene is a farm-yard, where the feeding of poultry, pigs, and cattle, seems to break the sleep and silence of the season: the contrast of the still and busy life is excellent. The tail-piece is a shepherd carrying one of his flock in a snow-storm. The business of February is ploughing and sowing; the rooks are wondering, and all nature is just astir. In March, we have felling timber; in April, angling, the ferry, and harrowing; with the landscape just freshened by a shower, and the hop in the sky. May is decidedly redolent of whitethorn, and budding boys and girls in the roads and hedges. In leafy June, we have the mowers at their work, and the heavy load of hay. In July, the business is Sheep-washing and Shearing; a rustic bridge, and the milkmaid crossing. In August, the reapers are at work, and the children gambol amid the rustling reaped corn. September shows us the orchard, and the fruit and hop-gatherers, happy amid their golden spoil. October is a sorry time of the life:—

"The trudging sow leads forth her numerous young,
Playful, and white, and clean, the brises sunning;
And o'er their heads, loud rising flit the flocks
Brisht from their caps the rattling treasure falls BLOOMFIELD.

December is a heavily-laden coach, the horses led by the guard through the snow-drifts, stuck and fast-falling; the tailpiece, a happy circle round a farmer's fire. The letter-press to this beautiful Series of Illustrations has been written by Mr. Thomas Miller, who has evidently luxuriated in such kindred subjects: his descriptions teem with eloquent poetry and truthful nature. We quote a portion of the "November," with the Illustrations:—

"In the stormy east wind straining,
The pale yellow woods are waning,
The broad stream in its banks complaining,
Heavily the low sky raining TENNYSON

"Windy, rainy, dark November, which seems as if sent purposely to make us more in love with home. What a roaring there is now in the woods—what a jabbing of branches and clashing together of great grey iron boughs, that groan again in their mighty agony, as the storm tries in vain to tear them from their gnarled and knotty stems. The streams foam and dash and hurry on in their headlong course, as if they had now no cause to linger—no flowers to mirror back—no green shady sprays to cover them, but were eager to reach their journey's end, and empty themselves into river or sea, to escape from the blinding rain that is ever coming down heavily. The gardens have a desolate and dreary look; and, if a flower still lingers behind, it looks like a mourner bending over a grave, and envying the dead that lie below: it seems lost in the world without its companions, and you are glad when it is gone.

COUNTRY SCENES.—NOVEMBER.

(FROM THE "ILLUSTRATED LONDON ALMANACK" FOR 1848.)

"November is the pioneer of Winter; he marches foremost, and gathers all the decayed leaves into dark hollows and dreary places, where they lie to be blown and strown upon, until the work of decay and death is completed. The song-birds that gladdened our woods and hills are now far away over the sea: the twitter of the swallows no longer falls upon the ear between the showers, as it did in Spring; nor is there even the murmuring of a bee, to vary the monotonous moaning of the wind, and the dull dead plashing of the rain. The cattle stand disconsolate beside the leafless hedges, looking wistfully towards the well-stored farm-yard, as if wondering why they are kept so long from the snug, warm, and well-filled stall. The woodman drags his way wearily towards the forest, trying in vain to whistle the cheerful tunes which seemed to shorten his journey in Spring, and glad when the short day has drawn to a close. There is a ragged and vagrant look about the clouds, and they seem to wander homeless about the sky, as if they had no resting place, but were driven hither and thither at the will of that harsh overseer, the wind. Such are the objects we pick out amid the gloomy shadows of November.

"Frequently during Autumn the heavy rains which descend flood the low countries beside rivers for miles around, sometimes breaking through the embankments before any one is prepared for such a disaster, and rushing into the fields where the cattle are still left to pick up what they can. A strange appearance does a country present thus laid suddenly under water. You see cottages and hayricks half buried; hedges, whose outlines you can only trace by the topmost twigs which rise above the surface; and far out to the foot of the opposite hills, what was but a few days ago a green open landscape, is now, with the exception of a few half-buried objects, one wide watery scene. Footpaths and gates are no longer visible; you can only tell where the broad brown level highway went winding along, by the marks of some particular tree that grew here and there beside it;—and where the hay and straw and broken boughs have drifted and lodged against the trees, or the uncovered tops of the higher hedges; there water rats and water-shrews, and mice of all descriptions, and weasels and ferrets, friends and foes, all huddled together, may be found sheltering, and at peace, amid the terrors created by such a wide spreading deluge. Here the naturalist may meet with objects which he has hunted for in vain for years, for all that burrows underground, conceals itself amid the reed-covered banks, or hides under the thick entangling hedgerows, is now compelled to brave the unwelcome light of day, for everything excepting man possesses the power of swimming for a considerable time; he alone finds it difficult to 'keep his head above water.'"

These, however, are but detached passages; and the description of the month, to be appreciated, must be viewed as a picture—as a whole.

We have left ourselves room to say but little of the Miscellaneous Department of the Almanack, which is unusually copious on its Astronomical Information, carefully furnished by Mr. Glaisher, of the Royal Observatory, Greenwich. The Lists of the New Parliament are very complete.

For the wrapper, Mr. Harvey has contributed a new design—a charming composition of classic taste and feeling.

THE TAPIR,

PRESENTED BY HER MAJESTY TO THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The Tapir, or Neborebi, as it is called by the Guaranese, is a native of the marshy river banks in most of the warm countries of South America. It belongs to the Pachydermatous tribe of Quadrupeds; and has, according to Mr. Bennet, the nearest osteological relation to the rhinoceros: while its external resemblance to the hog will strike the spectator at once, as well as the indication, on the other hand, which its slightly proboscidean muzzle affords of some affinity to the elephant. As the full size attributed by Azara to the male of this species is a total length of six feet, the specimen from which our drawing was made must be regarded as a fine one; and a very valuable addition to the previous gifts with which her Majesty has so munificently enriched the Society's collection on former occasions, which we have had the gratification of recording.

Azara informs us that in Paraguay the Tapirs sleep by day in the thickest recesses of the forests, and emarge by night to feed on grass, pompions, and water-melons. They are, however, by no means scrupulous in the selection of their diet, and, with the exception of the hog, are the most omnivorous of the group to which they belong. The hide is immensely tough and thick, and effectually protects the animal in its passage through the dense vegetation in which it dwells. The flesh is said by Azara to be "greatly commended by good judges," and is eagerly sought for by the natives, who pursue it with dogs and destroy it with poisoned arrows.

THE GREAT BUSTARDS, IN THE GARDENS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

The last abodes of the Great Bustard in England were Salisbury Plain, the Yorkshire Wolds, and the open country about Newmarket. In all these localities it is now, however, extinct; its large size and wandering habits having rendered abortive all the efforts of the landowners for its protection. The acquisition of ... specimens from which our Illustration has been made will, therefore, be a matter of much interest to the numerous class of the community who cultivate the study of our native animals, as well as to the sportsman who deplores the absence of so noble an object of his pursuit. They are birds of the present year, and were obtained from Central Germany, where they are still found in considerable numbers. The plains of Spain, Italy, and the Levant, are also reported to produce a certain number of this species, which, although rapidly decreasing, has a very extensive geographical distribution. In India, Australia, and Africa, the Great Bustard is represented by kindred forms—of which, however, none exceeds it in beauty of colour or majesty of carriage.

The males, when perfectly adult, are adorned with a fan-like tuft of long slender feathers, which grow downwards and backwards from the chin; they not unfrequently attain a total length of forty-five inches, although the females are nearly one-fourth less in all their dimensions. The anatomical structure presents some striking peculiarities, which will be found in detail, with many other interesting particulars, in Mr. Yarrell's excellent "History of British Birds."

The last recorded instance of a Bustard in England was in the Spring of 1844. A solitary female was killed near Boreham, in Cornwall, in a turnip-field, which it had frequented for some days previously; the country people devoutly believing it to be an eagle, in consequence of its great size and the noise with which it rose from its covert. We believe that this specimen is now in the fine collection of British Birds which has been formed in that county by E. H. Rodd, Esq., of Penzance.

GREAT BUSTARDS IN THE GARDENS OF THE ZOOLOGICAL SOCIETY.

CONFIRMATION AT SUTTON COURTNEY.

On the afternoon of Monday last, Oct. 25, the Lord Bishop of Oxford held a Confirmation at the Church of Sutton Courtney, near Abingdon. About two hundred candidates were assembled, and the Church was crowded with attentive hearers. His Lordship was accompanied by the Venerable Archdeacon Clerke. The village—which is a real old English scene with grassy banks sloping to the Thames, quaint old manor-houses with twisted chimney-shafts, dormer windows, and fine ancestral elms—was thronged with happy crowds, assembled from many a mile around. There was also a goodly array of the neighbouring gentry and Clergy. We particularly noticed Mrs. Bowles, of the Abbey House, Abingdon; John Bowles, Esq., of Milton Hill; Mrs. Clerke, of Milton; the Misses Ashurst, of Waterstock; Mrs. Gregson, of Sutton Courtney Abbey; Mrs. Barrett, of Milton House; the Revs. Dodson, Cox, Cary, Gregson, Robinson, Vincent, Carter, &c., &c.

We give a view of the Church, which is a noble pile, built and founded by William the Conqueror. The tower is still in its original state of massive strength. Unscathed by the lapse of eight centuries, it has seen the banners of Thomas, Earl of Courtney, pass by on their way to oppose Edward the Fourth, at Towton Field; it has seen the fiery Rupert and his brother Maurice, with Sir Henry Gage, pass over Culhambridge on their way to the storming of Abingdon; it has seen the homesteads of Sutton Wick and Appleford lighted by the stern hands of Prince Charles's Dragoons; and, on Monday last, its bells welcomed the Prelate of Oxford on his peaceful and holy mission of "laying on of hands."

The Bishop of Oxford was entertained at Sutton Courtney Abbey, the ancient abode of the Abbots of Abingdon, by the Rev. John Gregson, the Vicar of the parish. His Lordship inspected the schools, and spent the night in the Abbot's dormitory. We give a sketch of the West Front of the monastic pile. Some of the rooms, and several of the ancient windows, remain.

SUTTON COURTNEY CHURCH.

The Church presents a very interesting epitome of Anglican Church Architecture; the characteristics of which we find thus cleverly detailed in the appendix to the splendid folio "History of the Great Western Railway," lately published:

The tower is late Norman, and its lower story has flat low buttresses, with round-headed Norman windows; the next story is without buttresses, and has pointed Norman windows. Above it is a Norman corbel-table, that probably carried the original parapet; the upper story being a decorated addition. The nave has four arches on each side; on the north they are decorated, the arches drop, the piers octagonal; on the south, the three eastern arches are exactly as the four on the north, but the fourth or western arch is different and very curious. The pier is decided and good early English, with a bell-cap. The arch is pointed Norman, with crenelle and chevron moulding, bold and good; but, just above the pier is a single ball-flower of Decorated date. This arch must have been under-pinned, and the pier inserted, the ball-flower being a still later addition. The whole exhibits a well-marked style of the manner in which the ancient architects mixed the styles. The north and south aisles are Decorated, with good Perpendicular additions; in the latter, a chantry is still screened off. The chancel is Early Decorated: on the north side some altar-tombs have been thrust into a good Decorated sepulchre. The south porch is of brick, and late Perpendicular, with an upper chamber, in which is a small library. There is a good Perpendicular rood-loft and screen, unusually perfect. The Font is a cylinder, with a band of intersecting arches, probably late Norman.

SUTTON COURTNEY ABBEY.

THE BIRKENHEAD DOCKS.—These Docks and the important works connected with them, are now about to be completed at Government expense. On condition of the piece of made land on the north side of the entrance to the great float being recovered to the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, they engage to pay £44,000 to complete the sea wall, and to advance £150,000 more for the purpose of finishing the great float and embankments. The Commissioners have accepted the conditions.

WESTERN JEWISH GIRLS' FREE SCHOOL.—The first public examination of the pupils of the Western Jewish Girls' Free School, took place on Monday, at Mr. Caldwell's Academy, No. 20, Dean-street, Soho, in the presence of his Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, Patron of the institution. The attendance was very numerous, and included the Reverend the Chief Rabbi, the Baroness de Rothschild, Lady Montefiore, Baron A. de Rothschild, Mr. J. M. Johnson, Mr. S. L. de Symonds, Mr. J. P. Salomons, &c. The examination continued for three hours, and included Scripture history; catechism, comprising the decalogue, the thirteen articles of the Jewish faith, the feasts, and fasts, &c.; Hebrew reading, and translation of prayers; English reading, grammar, arithmetic, writing, geography, history, and needlework. A preliminary prayer, in English, and an ode were also recited by the pupils. Prizes were distributed to the more deserving of the pupils by his Royal Highness. After which the Chief Rabbi addressed the assemblage at some length on the importance of promoting education among their poorer brethren.

OPENING OF A RAILWAY CHAPEL AT GATCOMBE.

We are happy to illustrate in our pages the opening of a Building for Divine worship for the attendance of the labourers now engaged in forming the South Wales Railway. We agree with a Correspondent, to whom we are indebted for this communication, that it is very desirable to awaken some sympathy in the public mind, in regard to men whose habits and occupations seem almost to have rendered them a distinct class of persons, and whose migratory lives, for several years, have hitherto excluded them from those benefits which we talk largely of sending abroad to the Heathen, while our own valuable railway labourers at home have met with but partial efforts for their enlightenment. The present is, we believe, the first step we have taken towards that object: and, considering that the South Wales Line will be 140 miles in extent, it would, indeed, be sowing the seeds of much future good, if, by any means, a well-regulated system of instruction could be carried throughout its length; and public opinion would, doubtless, go far to accomplish this.

RAILWAY CHAPEL ON THE SOUTH WALES LINE.

The interesting ceremony of opening the Chapel took place on Sunday, the 17th instant—being the day appointed by her Majesty as a day of thanksgiving for the late abundant harvest. The Lord Bishop of Gloucester having granted a licence, the service was performed by the Rev. W. Malpass, Curate of Blakeney; and the address and sermon were founded on the 8th, 9th, and 10th verses of the 107th Psalm, illustrating not only the special duties of the day, but also bringing forward in a most feeling and judicious manner the purposes for which Divine Service had been established in that place, and amongst a class of men whose spiritual welfare and means of improvement have generally been so much neglected.

The order and decorum evinced by the "Navvies," together with the serious attention they paid to the impressive exhortation of the minister, shows that, where the effort is made to bring the Gospel of Peace among them, even their rough nature will respond to the endeavour; and it is greatly to be hoped and desired that the various attempts which have lately been made for the religious instruction of these hard-working men should meet with increased encouragement, not only from the Directors of the Railways and the Contractors, but also from the Clergy, and inhabitants of those localities through which lines of railway are in course of formation.

The Building fitted up and used as a Chapel is situated in a quiet bay of the Severn, and was formerly used as a warehouse; but, being purchased by the South Wales Railway Company, for the purpose of being pulled down to make room for the Railway, it has been cleaned and fitted up by Mr. Sharpe, the Contractor, to be set apart for Divine Worship until the progress of the works renders its demolition imperative. It is capable of containing about 200 persons; and on the day of opening was very well attended by the various officers of the Company, and many of the "Navvies," together with some persons from the adjoining villages. The works of the South Wales Railway are of no ordinary character in this district, and will, probably, occupy a longer time than usual in their completion; so that a great number of men will now be induced to attend a place of worship for several months, who, probably, would otherwise have spent the Sunday in idleness or intoxication.

The scenery here is of the finest description, and is well worth a visit from the tourist, if he can find time to divorge about one mile from the Gloucester and Chepstow turnpike-road, at the village of Blakeney.

FRETHERNE CHURCH.

On Thursday, the 21st inst., the village of Fretherne, in Gloucestershire, was the scene of a very interesting and impressive ceremony, such as is, happily, of more frequent occurrence now, than in past years. The Parish Church, picturesquely situated on the banks of the Severn, was, a year or two back, an unsightly specimen of that neglect and bad taste, which, during the last century, wrought silently, but too effectually, the destruction of so many relics of the piety and genius of our forefathers. The old pile was in so dilapidated a condition, and presented so unecclesiastical an appearance, that it was determined to pull it entirely down, and to erect on the same site the present beautiful little edifice. The expense of upwards of £3000 has been, for the most part, liberally defrayed by the Rector, the Rev. William Darell, and his friends; assisted by grants from the Incorporated Society, as well as from the Diocesan Church Building Society.

The new Church was consecrated on the 21st, by the Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol, assisted by eighty of his clergy, and in the presence of a crowded congregation, consisting of the gentry of the neighbourhood. At the conclusion of the ceremony, the Bishop and a numerous party partook of the kind hospitalities at the Rectory, which extended to the poor of the parish, and the children of the school, who were regaled in the School-house (also newly erected by their esteemed incumbent) upon roast beef and plum-pudding, and other elements of good old English fare; after which, his Lordship and the greater part of the company returned to the Church, to inspect more minutely its interior decorations, which are, of the kind, perfect.

NEW CHURCH AT FRETHERNE.

The new Church is in the late decorated or transition style. The plan consists of a nave, 40 feet by 18 feet; a chancel, 20 feet by 14 feet, with a vestry on the south side, 8 feet by 9 feet; a north aisle adjoining the nave, 23 feet by 9 feet 6 inches; at the west end of which is a tower surmounted by a broach spire, 9 feet square internally. The north aisle is open to, and divided from, the nave, by stone piers and arches. The principal entrance into the Church is through the tower on the north, the bottom part of which forms a porch. A priest's door, or entrance into the chancel, is also on the north side, and opposite to it is the entrance into the vestry, which also has an outer entrance from the churchyard. The walls are 3 feet 6 inches thick, lined internally with white free-stone ashlar, no plaster being used anywhere in the church, and they are faced with a brown sand stone externally, in places exceedingly hard, had from the quarries at Stapleehorne, near Dursley. The external dressing and moulded work, as well as the spire, bell turret, crosses, &c., being all of Bath stone, the contrast of colour between the Bath and brown sand stone, has a very good effect. The floors are laid with encaustic tiles in pattern. The font is of white freestone, from Painswick, carved and moulded, and raised upon a grey Forest stone step. The whole of the roofs, the timbers of which are [illegible] are of Memel timber, stained. The principals, which are strongly [illegible] and filled with tracery, spring from stone corbels, having carved heads and other emblematic devices. The whole of the sittings, which are open, as well as the altar rails, seats, reading desk, pulpit, font, cover, and table, &c., are of Riga carved oak, stained dark. The whole of the nave, transept, and other windows, are filled with stained glass. The east and west windows contain subjects illustrating the Life of our Blessed Lord. The whole of the painted glass has been executed by Mr. Rogers, of Worcester, and reflects great credit on his taste and talent. The organ is placed on the floor, under the west window, in the nave.

Many of the interior fittings have been sent from and executed by parties of note both in London and elsewhere, viz.:—by Messrs. Potter, Terry, and Co., by the Patent Carving Company, and Messrs. Minton and Co. The contractors for the building were Messrs. Ashbee, of Kingscote, and Cockerton, of Cheltenham; and the whole has been done under the inspection and direction of Mr. Francis Niblett, of Gloucester, architect.

LILLIPUTIAN LOCOMOTIVE ENGINE.

We give on the preceding page, a sketch of the Lilliputian Locomotive Engine launched on the Eastern Counties Line, on Saturday last. Though small in size, it will not be small in its results, as tending to show that, for many important purposes, speed may be attained with small weight. This little engine, in short, is to the usual ponderous locomotive what the race-horse is to the dray-horse. The origin of it, we understand, was as follows:—Mr. Samuel, the Resident Engineer of the Line, having before his eyes the economising of the Shareholders' and Directors' pockets, had long viewed with uneasiness the sundry gaps in that diem he was forced to expend in the use of large locomotives for the purpose of surveying the Line. By his orders, Messrs. Adams, of Fair Field Works, constructed for him a manumotive machine, with six feet driving wheels, with which a speed of twelve to fifteen miles per hour was attained. But this speed was insufficient; and, moreover, manual labour was found costly. Dissatisfied, but not disheartened, he began to think of the possibility of procuring a locomotive to travel some twenty miles per hour, and weigh only half a ton, so that on an emergency it might be lifted off the Line. Messrs. Adams undertook to construct it, and, under the directions of Mr. Samuel, the working drawings were prepared. Everything was made as light as possible, and wooden wheels were used, the axles being only six feet apart. On the first trial, it was found too small and short for steadiness. A new boiler was then put in, new iron wheels, and larger axles; and the result has astonished all who predicted—first, that, though pretty and workmanlike, it would not go—secondly, that it was so light it would fly off the rails. It has, however, neither sinned in omission nor in commission. It has become not a "great fact," but a little fact pregnant with great consequences, and not least to those of the daily and weekly press, reducing their express expenses on the rail to one fourth the existing amount; for, in this age, we cannot conceive that his will long remain a solitary engine, with the working expenses reduced to a few shillings per day.

The following are the dimensions of the Engine. The entire length of frame of engine and carriage, which is one, 12 feet 6 inches, on four wheels, 3 feet 8 inches in diameter, the leading and driving wheels being of equal size; and the width from centre to centre nine feet, the wheels being outside all. The frame is divided in the middle by a bulk-head, into two compartments, the foremost containing the engine and machinery, and the latter the seats for the passengers. The boiler is a vertica. one, on the American principle, consisting of 94 tubes, an inch and a quarter each in diameter, the diameter being two feet, and height three feet six inches. The fire beneath is one foot from the rails, level with the floor, and the entire height of flue, boiler, and chimney, seven feet six inches. The machinery, the working parts of which are all composed of steel, is enclosed in bx ves on the sides of the compartment, consisting of two inside cylinders, three inches in diameter, with a long inch stroke, crank axle, link motion, with the usual reversing gear. The water tank is in the cross seat, against the division board of the two compartments, and will hold a sufficient supply for a run of from eighteen to twenty miles. Coke is used in consequence of its being so much easier of combustion than coke. in a furnace of such small dimensions. The passenger compartment is open, and resembles what is termed an inside Irish car, having a seat crosswise against the division board, and one on either side, which together will conveniently accommodate seven persons. The weight of the engine, which is suspended on spiral bearing springs, when in working order, exclusive of passengers, is about 22 cwt., and is able to travel at the rate of forty miles an hour, the boiler having borne with ease a pressure of 200 to the square inch; but it is not intended to drive her at this rate of speed or pressure on ordinary occasions.

In the trial trip, on Saturday, Mr. Samuel, with this little Engine, accomplished the journey from London to Cambridge (57½ miles) in 1¾ hour; in more than one instance during which the speed attained was at the rate of 43 miles per hour.

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

It is, we think, some three or four years since the experiment was first tried, at this theatre, of representing Shakspeare's comedy of "The Taming of the Shrew," in the style in which it was originally performed—that is to say, without the scenery, but with the localities merely indicated by a placard hung on some curtains, according to ancient custom. The idea was a good one, and from its novelty, attracted; and now the play has been presented with equal effect, being acted on Tuesday evening. The "induction" was given, the Lord and Sly being played by Mr. Rogers and Mr. Lambert; and the principal characters in the play itself were cast as follows: Petruchio, Mr. Webster; Grumio, Mr. Keeley; and Catharine, Mrs. Nisbett. Keeley's Grumio was delicious; possibly, with the exception of Mrs. Nisbett, it was the best sustained part in the piece—admirably acted throughout, and never once falling at a point. Our play-going readers can readily conceive how glorious the lady was as Catharine; we never remember to have seen her look so well as she has done this season. And Mr Webster kept his position of a strong-minded lady-tamer, and cracked his whip, with a hearty determination that always made an effect upon the audience. Mr. Lambert, from the Adelphi, was a very fair representative of the tinker, but we missed the uncurious oddness that characterised poor Strickland's performance. The house was very well filled.

The new comedy, by Mr. Sullivan, whose "Beggar on Horseback" was so favourably received last year at the Haymarket. Few modern pieces have had out so much promise as the one just named; and the production of another, by the same author, is looked forward to with some interest by the play-goers.

The Lyceum has been crowded every night, the extreme beauty of the house having been really a topic of conversation. The pieces have been considerably improved by representation. The "playing cheese," to use a theatrical term—and going generally better with the audience. Mr. Buckstone, it is said, will bring out a novelty, in which Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam—a young lady who has gained much celebrity in the provinces, will appear for the first time before a London audience.

"Macbeth" has proved a great success for Sadler's Wells; and too much praise cannot be given to the management for the very careful way in which it has been produced. Houses of greater pretensions might take some useful hints from the general mise en scène. The same remarks will hold good at the Marylebone, with respect to "Hamlet," with which piece the "Gamester" and the "Jealous Wife," have alternated during the week.

"The Bottle" is still the favourite piece at the minor houses, the version at the City Theatre being, next to common report, the best. Yesterday we saw a troop of men advertising the piece, gravely marching along the pavement, dressed to represent large bottles, their hats forming the cork. The effect was exceedingly ludicrous, and the cortege, altogether, affords a great sport to the boys, ever great amateurs of gratuitous pageants.

Our readers may have observed near the theatres, and elsewhere, the simultaneous opening of a number of shops for the sale of "Gauffres" that at the corner of Bow-street being the principal one, and always surrounded by a crowd of spectators. Gauffres are light cakes, that have long been known at the French Ecu. They are made of batter, poured into an iron shape, something like an enormous bullet mould, flattened and squared. In this, they are cooked over a charcoal fire, and when ready, powdered with sugar, and brought over them. At times they are in such demand, that the cooks cannot keep pace with the customers. Although they look large, there is literally next to nothing in them, their walls being exceedingly thin. They have proved very lucrative to the ingenious speculator.

Opening of a new Corn Exchange at Birmingham.—The formal opening of a very handsome edifice for the purpose of a Corn Exchange was celebrated by a public dinner in that town on Tuesday, at which Mr. Councillor Lucy presided, supported by about 300 of the most considerable agriculturists and corn dealers of the district. The party was purely a social one, and the speeches did not consequently possess any general interest.

IRELAND.

SUICIDE OF PROFESSOR M'CULLAGH.

A most melancholy event occurred in Dublin University. While labouring under temporary aberration, arising, it is believe i, from too ardent a devotion to abstruse studies, this distinguished gentleman put a period to his own existence, by cutting his throat with a razor on the night of the 24th inst. From the calm and the determination with which the fatal purpose was effected, that both the carotid and jugular were divided, three separate incisions having been made. An inquest was held upon the body on the following afternoon; and, by the evidence of the Rev. Mr. Butcher, an intimate friend of the deceased, it appeared that the latter had been in low spirits during the past week, and that he had been more desponding on Saturday than on the preceding days. He had a constitutional tendency to melancholy. He was a delicate man, and worked very hard His laboured under an impression that there were statements and charges in circulation against him.

Dr. Stokes, a physician and one of the oldest and most intimate friends of the deceased, deposed to the following facts:—I think I never had occasion to prescribe for him till last Monday. He generally enjoyed better health than most men who lead a sedentary life. He called upon me in company with a friend; the friend said to me that he was not very well, that his breath was heavy, and he was depressed. Did not prescribe for him then. Upon Wednesday evening I received a note from him. He said that he was not well, though not in pain, but was afraid that something in his manner had excited the suspicion of his friends, and that persons might suppose he was ill. He did not say mental illness, but his wish it is to be inferred. I told him that he was labouring under dyspepsia, derangement of stomach. He was melancholy. He said he had been working hard at a difficult mathematical problem. On Monday I gave him a blue pill and rhubarb draught. He mentioned to me that he had been drinking green tea, which evidently had deranged his stomach very much. He was a man of strictly temperate habits. I saw him three times on Wednesday and Thursday. I told him to give up his mat ematical studies and go out. He arranged to go to a friend in the country. He was wonderfully bet-er on Thursday, and still better on Friday, when he promised to come and see me. [illegible] that he chiefly complained of was, lest, during his illness, persons might have conceived that his mind was not all right [illegible] "Never you," said he, "are looking at me." "Why," said I, "one cannot look cheerful to see you ill." He spent Saturday evening with me as my own house. He was perfectly well to all appearance He showed no aberration of mind more than as to natural despondency He asked me would I go to the Colle ge Chapel on Sunday, and I said yes. He got up and went down and breakfasted with me, and we will go together. I did so. The only thing remarkable was that when I came he had breakfasted. He had breakfast prepared for me. His habit, he s id, was to breakfast upon getting up. There was nothing about him that to draw the attention of any person who had known that he was ill. He acknowledged that he had been ill—that he had been in a dreamy state, but to that illness was passing or had passed away. As far as I could ascertain about his depression, it was that his manner had excited suspicion that he was not right in his mind, and that this would go out and damage his character and prospects. I assured him that his illness arose from physical causes, and that his depression was merely the result of those causes. He said that medical men might think as I did, but that others would interpret it into mental illness. There was nothing extraordinary in his state. The only thing unusual in his case was that he had improved so much, and then relapsed. I think his former hallucination was stronger than it had been. Upon the Thursday he said to me that my servant thinks me very ill, and that she watches me. Upon one occasion he went to the door and shut it, and said that she was listening. I believe him to have been a very religious man. On Sunday morning I found him reading Butler's Sermons, which he said it was his habit to read. He asked me if I had ever read them. I said I had not; and he said, tapping me on the shoulder—"My dear friend, I could not recommend you a better book." He often seemed labouring under despondency, but I never saw him in such health and spirits as he was in since the College election. I heard that two years ago he had an attack on his lung. I do not think that the stoppage of that ulcer affected his mind, because he was in excellent health. He stated in his conversation that his object was to bring a still stronger bearing between natural and revealed religion.

Dr. Leeson deposed to the appearance of the body after death; and the Jury returned the following verdict:—"We find that Professor James M'Cullagh died of wounds inflicted upon himself while labouring under temporary insanity."

Mr M'Cullagh was a candidate for the representation of the University at the last election. His reputation as a scholar and man of letters was European.

TENANT-RIGHT MEETING

The grand demonstration which was announced to take place on the subject of tenant right, came off on Sunday, at Kilmeethomas, a village about 15 miles from Waterford. It was attended by upwards of 1000 of the farmer and labouring classes, and a few landholders; but the number of the latter class present was very limited. There was a large force of military of the 6th Dragoon Guards of the 34th Light Infantry, together with a large force of mounted and foot police present, to preserve order. Amongst those on the platform were—Mr. John O'Connell, M.P., who came from Dublin by special invitation, to take part in the proceedings. Viscount Ingestre, M.P.; Mr. M. Power, M.P.; Mr. L. Keating, M.P.; W. H. W. Barron, Bart.; the Very Rev. Dean Burke; Mr. J. Power, of Gurteen; the Mayor of Waterford, and about forty Roman Catholic clergymen.

The chair was taken by Mr. N. Power, one of the members for the county.

Sir H. W. Barron proposed the first resolution, and Messrs Keatings, M.P.; Alderman Meagher, M.P.; Mr. Power, M.P.; the Mayor of Waterford &c., proposed, and tenant-farmers seconded, the remainder of the resolutions, in speeches to the same effect, strongly urging upon the Legislature the imperati e necessity of passing a tenant-right measure, to establish a permanent and fair settlement-right throughout the country, and urging at the same time the old remedy of Repeal as the only sure cure for the ills under which Ireland labours.

The resolutions set forth that the relations between landlord and tenant were marked by contention, insecurity, injustice, outrage, and the spilling of blood. That these distractions were the consequence of the disastrous composition for land which had been imposed upon the people by their sole right to the privation of other resources for maintenance, since the ruin of Irish manufactures and trade under the blighting act of Union, and that the effects of that iron statute had been aggravated by the inattention of the Legislature to the interests of the tenant class. That it was just and imperative that the landlord's rights of property should be respected, but equally just and imperative that the tenant's rights should be equally respected and protected. That the neglect and wickedness of the just rights of the tenants checked industry and depressed agriculture, and thereby impeded and diminished the accumulation of national wealth. That the custom of tenant-right had given security and property to every district of the north of Ireland in which it prevails; that it fully secured the landlord in his rent, whilst it encouraged the tenant, by the security which it gave him, to lay out his capital, and give his best labour to the improvement of his holding. That without peopling this meeting to the strict adoption of tenant right as it existed in the north, the meeting found that the main feature of this custom was that the occupier could not, whether a tenant from year to year or on lease, be ejected from his holding without being allowed to sell the occupancy or possession (including his interest in any improvements made by him) to the highest bidder, due notice being first given to the landlord, that he might compete for the purchase, and the latter being also secured in the payment of all rent due to him on the proceeds of the sale.

A petition to Parliament embodying the substance of the resolutions, and strongly urging the establishment of such tenant-right as would secure the interests of both landlord and tenant, was then adopted; and an Address having been presented to Mr. O'Connell, as the leader of the Irish people," was accompanied by a subscription of £50 to the funds of the Repeal Association from Carlow, the meeting dispersed, giving three cheers for Tenant-right, Repeal, and Old Ireland.

A rescript dated 9th October, has been received in Dublin, from the Pope, containing an unqualified condemnation of the new Provincial Colleges, or "Godless Colleges," which have been established for the education of the people under the act passed by Sir Robert Peel's Government. The rescript was addressed to Dr. McHale, Archbishop of Tuam, but copies were transmitted to all the Archbishops. We have not yet obtained the documents entire. The substance it is as follows: After fully exonerating from any but the purest and best motives those prelates who were favourable to the institution of these Colleges, the rescript recites the fears of the Holy See regarding the dangers that would be productive of grave danger to the Catholic faith, and its judgment that such an institution is detrimental to religion. The Irish Hierarchy are then admonished to take no part in carrying the plan into execution, and are commanded to retract whatever they may have done to the contrary. It is then recommended that the Catholic Colleges already existing be improved by the addition of more Chairs, especially in Theology, and the extension of their means of accommodating students, and also that efforts be made to establish in Ireland a Catholic Academy on the model of that founded at Louvain by the prelates of Belgium.

The Deputation of the Hierarchy. On Monday, a deputation of Prelates waited on the Lord Lieutenant, at the Viceregal Lodge, to present the memorial upon the state of destitution agreed to by the Prelates in synod a few days since. The deputation was composed of the Most Rev. Dr. Crolly, Primate, Armagh; the Most Rev. Dr. Murray, Archbishop of Dublin; the Most Rev. Dr. M'Hale, Archbishop of Tuam; and the Right Rev. Dr. Kennedy, Bishop of Kildare. The memorial, after adverting to the famine in the remote districts, where there were not available resources to avert a destruction of life, and to the causes of the distress in the unprecedented failure of other days &c., declared that the people to be a resource totally inadequate to the magnitude of the evil, and implored the influence of the Lord Lieutenant with the Government, to procure measures of relief more commensurate with the exigency. The prelates in question acted for the abe bodied was discussed; and while the nature of the proper measures to be adopted was left to the wisdom of Government, the memorialists concluded by declaring that no plan would be adequate which did not include the reclamation of waste land, to the cultivation of waste lands, and to the encouragement of fisheries, as subjects well deserving the attention of the Ministry. The Lord-Lieutenant, in his reply, after assuring the memorialists of his perfect sympathy, and his communication of the distress, acknowledged the unrighteous legislation of former times, and the possibility of the Poor-Law falling short of the emergency; but pressed that it should be carried out effectually. He dwelt energetica y upon the absolute necessity of active, united exertion among all classes in Ireland, and of allaying party feelings and strife by Christian charity; and concluded by expressing the gratification it gave him to confer with the Catholic Hierarchy, and the deference with which he should at all times receive their suggestions and counsels.

The Synod of the Catholic Prelates adjourned on the 26th until the middle of November. They passed two sets of resolutions, dated respectively on the 23rd and 26th inst. By the first, the Pope is thanked for his rescript against the Colleges. The second set, after acknowledging the courtesy with which the Lord-Lieutenant had received the deputation, and the enlightened manner contained in his answer to the memorial, proposes, in order to strengthen his anxious efforts" to secure efficient measures of relief, should his Excellency pre to carry his humane wishes into effect, that some members of the prelatical body of the clergy from the various districts of Ireland, and supported by some of the most efficient Irish members, be deputed to wait, if necessary, on her Majesty, about the middle of next month, "to lay at the foot of the throne, the starving and awful condition" of the Irish people.

Conciliation Hall.—The ordinary meeting of the "Old Ireland" Repealers took place on Monday, and Mr. O'Connell and others having made speeches of the usual kind, the week's rent was announced to be £83, and an adjournment to Thursday next, when a special meeting will be held to pass resolutions of thanks to the Pope.

Poor-Law.—The Athlone Board of Guardians rejected, by a majority of nine a motion for a new rate upon the Union. Already four Boards of Guardians have been abolished, and paid officers appointed to discharge the duties. The Unions in which those officers now administer the Poor-law are Castlebar and Ballinrobe, in the county of Mayo; Lowtherstown, county of Fermanagh; and Bantry, county of Cork. It is probable that the Commissioners will also dismiss the Boards of Guardians in Athlone Union.—Thirty-two additional inspectors have been appointed, in addition to those already gazetted. They were chiefly selected from amongst Government inspecting officers, under the relief system. This looks like a determination on the part of the Commissioners to enforce the Poor-law with vigour and strictness.

Dismissal of Another Board of Guardians.—The Commissioners have dismissed the Board of Guardians of the Union of Scariff, county of Limerick, in consequence of their refusal to carry out the Poor-law; and they have appointed two respectable merchants of Limerick Mr. John Joseph Fisher, a Quaker, and Mr. Christie, to discharge the duties.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR NOVEMBER.

The fine weather of late has had the effect of detaining many of the Parisian élégantes at their chateaux; so that we cannot state with such precision as could be wished the best models for the approaching winter. The novelties are, however, already very numerous and beautiful.

Manteaux.—There is nothing absolutely new in Manteaux, but only in their details; save this peculiarity—a greater fulness than hitherto. Collets are no longer in great request; rotondes and grandes jupes being only adapted for travelling. Manicleti and paletots with sleeves are occasionally seen. Passementerie continues in demand, though under a more unassuming form than last year; yet plays a great part in the embellishment of the toilettes, in satin, velvet, and cloth. Embroidery, very finely worked, on a ground of satin or velvet, with lace laid on flat, is also in demand.

Robes of cloth, trimmed with embroidery, are much worn; and some are worked en soutaches. The Ecossais, in satin and velvet, and poplin, is much worn at evening parties. The dress Estampées are almost invariably trimmed with ornaments à la Brandenbourg, whether they be lace, ribbon, or passementerie. The sleeves of the jupes are somewhat reduced in fulness and length a characteristic and bold innovation. The sleeves are equally full throughout, and are open at the wrists, so as to show the sleeve beneath. The Ecossais robes are trimmed with bouions de pierre et d'or, In town, fewer flounces are worn, in consequence of the pardessus being worn closer. The collars are always made very small, raised, and confined by a small handkerchief, à la col d'Amazon; for the toilette they are made of fine lace.

Chapeaux.—The velvets which were formerly so much in vogue for Chapeaux now give place to Caps. The Chapeaux are now much ornamented, and are made en capots or en chapeau, in a variety of materials; for instance, velvets epingles, and satins, and tulle, in addition to lace, ribbons, and flowers. The shapes are round, flattened in front. The calottes are now only worn semicircular: those à coulisse are trimmed with lace or bouillonne; or silk fringe, about a quarter of an inch deep.

Blondes of various colours are much in use; either close-fitting or négligé; according to the season.

Flowers, tulle, and lace, invariably employed as trimmings. Lace is more worn than ever, on manteaux, robes, collars, and bonnets.

AURORA BOREALIS.

On Sunday last there was a brilliant exhibition of Aurora; it was first seen at about half-past six in the evening, and occasional streamers alone were seen till 9h. 45m. After 9h. 50m. it was constantly changing; its appearance then, and for some little time after, was sketched at the time by Mrs. Glaisher, and from which the above engraving has been made; she has also supplied the following information respecting it:—At 9h. 55m. the portion A A was alone visible, presenting to the eye the fan-shaped appearance, as shown in the Engraving, and exhibiting all the tints of the most brilliant sunset: the column appeared to be composed of streamers, shading from the most intense crimson into the ruddiest and most brilliant orange; which orange again contrasting with the ruddy hue of the next portion, formed, by means of contrast upon contrast, an endless gradation of shade and colour; in fact, it was a truly gorgeous spectacle.

At 10h. 0m. the orange colour had entirely disappeared, and given place to an uniform deep crimson; the column had the appearance of a strong reflection from an immense conflagration; when suddenly, like the brisk unfurling of a fan, the light white fleecy columns, B, C, D, E, F, G, H, and the portion marked Q Q, formed; the portion Q Q, being in form and colour, precisely similar to that of A A, excepting being less bright. The several columns between these two red columns, appeared to be divided into sections, and were of the most silvery light, shaded, as shown in the engraving, with a delicate and pure grey. The columns B, C, D, E, F, G, and H, were perpetually glancing and shifting, though always with vertical motion; whilst the red portions continued unmoved. These movements of the central columns somewhat resembled, in appearance, the reflection upon a wall of a Gothic casement, lighted from within by some fitful and inconstant light. Thus, the portion G would suddenly glance into the place of B, whilst B would suddenly dart higher into the Zenith, and then both would as suddenly descend. These motions were not confined to one section alone, but the whole mass from B to H, appearing to be actuated by the same impulse at the same time. The rose-coloured extremities meanwhile remained immovable, though it rather appeared that, as the central silvery lights fluctuated, now bright, now dim, their very extremities fluctuated in direct opposition, the rosy hue becoming fainter, and inclining to a neutral tint in proportion as the silvery brightness increased.

At 10h. 12m. A.M., a considerable diminution of the parts B to H took place; the regular and casement-like appearance gradually disappeared, and assumed more of the character of the boundaries, although they still retained their fitful glancing motion, and their pale silvery hue. During the time of the above appearance two or three Auroral masses, milk white, and cloud-like (one of which is shown in the drawing) float d from W.N.W. to the S.E, and were remarkable for a kind of pulsation within them-elves.

At a quarter-past 10, the Moon, which was shining with unusual splendour, was surrounded by a beautiful corona, consisting of four concentric circles; that which was the nearest to the Moon was of a neutral tint, the next violet, then green, and the outermost red; the external edge of the latter passed just midway between the Moon and the planet Mars.

Towards midnight the appearance became again very splendid, and traces of the Aurora existed till after two o'clock in the morning of Monday. For more detailed accounts of this magnificent Aurora, see the forthcoming number of the "Philosophical Magazine."

Blackheath, October 25, 1847. James Glaisher.

It was a holy Sabbath night,
The gale blew clear and high,
When lo! a glory of God's light
Shone up athwart the sky.

A faint thin vapour—misty, dim,
First to the gaze was given,
That rode from the horizon's rim
To topmost vault of Heaven!

Like column'd snow, the pillar grew,
While a veiled bride,
Up—mass on mass—new vapours flew,
And climb'd it either side!

Thick and more thick, their fleecy wings
Sail on towards the North;
While opposite in lustre springs
The Moon's full radiance forth.

More and more glory, grandly now
Upon the vision came.
The column wore a godlike brow,
And took the hue of flame!

While from the arch that curved in sight
Where round the masses grew,
There shot quick streams of silver light
Far—far into the blue!

Then where the flame with crimson hue
Had made its glowing bed,
The stars in burning groups shone through,
And gleamed behind the red.

Still round and round the streamers bright
Would flit in many a form,
Till the flame-pillar lost it's light
And took the dark of storm!

One moment more, and as a cloud
In smoke it fled away;
Gone was the Meteor and the shroud,
And Night again was gay!

Gay with its Moon and myriad gems
And clouds like sheep wind-driven Night's Queen with all her diadems
Reigned calm again in Heaven.

GUTTA PERCHA.

This substance is of recent introduction to England, and was first brought under the notice of the Society of Arts in the autumn of 1843. The history of its discovery is thus given by Dr. Montgomerie:—"While at Singapore, in 1842, I on one occasion observed in the hands of a Malayan woodsman, the handle of a

THE GUTTA PERCHA PLANT.

parang made of a substance which appeared quite new to me. My curiosity was excited, and, on inquiry I found it was made of the Gutta Percha, and that it could be moulded into any form, by simply dipping it into boiling water until it was heated throughout, when it became plastic as clay, and when cold, regained, unchanged, its original hardness and rigidity. I immediately possessed myself of the article, and desired the man to fetch me as much more of it as he could get. On making some experiments with it, I at once discovered that, if procurable in large quantities, it would become extensively useful." The discovery was communicated to the Medical Board of Calcutta, and subsequently to the Society of Arts in London

Sir W. J. Hooker states the tree from which Gutta Percha is procured, to belong to the natural order sapotaceæ, found in abundance in the island of Singapore, and in some dense forests at the extremity of the Maylayan peninsula. Mr. Brooke reports the tree to be called Nyato by the Sarawak people, but they are not acquainted with the properties of the sap; it attains a considerable size, even as large as six feet in diameter; is plentiful in Sarawak, and most probably, all over the island of Borneo. The tree is stated to be one of the largest in the forests in which it is found. The timber is too loose and open for building purposes; but the tree bears a fruit which yields a concrete oil, used for food.

Gutta Percha is contained in the sap and milky juice, which quickly coagulates on exposure to the air; from twenty to thirty pounds being the average produce of one tree. For collecting the sap, the trees are felled, barked, and left dry, and useless, so great is the demand for the Gutta, the importation of which already reaches many hundred tons annually. Hence the forests will soon be cleared of the Gutta trees; whereas, it is believed that a constant and moderate supply might be secured by incisions in the bark, as in the case of Caoutchouc.

The Gutta is received in scraps, or in rolls of thin layers. It is first freed from impurities by devilling or kneading in hot water, when it is left soft and plastic and of a whitish grey colour.

When thus prepared, the Gutta has many curious properties. Below the temperature of 50 degrees, it is as hard as wood, but it will soon receive an indentation from the finger-nail. When softened in hot water, it may easily be cut and moulded; and it will harden, as it cools, to its former rigidity; and it may be softened and hardened any number of times without injury to the material. Unlike caoutchouc, it has little elasticity; but, it has such tenacity, that a slip, one-eighth of an inch substance, sustained 42lb. weight, and only broke with a pressure of 56lb. When drawn out, it remains without contracting

In solution, Gutta Percha is applied, like caoutchouc, for waterproofing cloth. It is likewise used for numerous purposes for which leather is used; in mastics and cements, &c. In short, it promises to become as important an article of commerce as caoutchouc itself.

The name is a pure Malayan one; gutta meaning the gum, or concrete juice of a plant, and percha the particular tree from which this is procured. The ch is not pronounced hard like a k, but like the ch in the English name of the fish perch. It has been suggested to Dr. Montgomerie, that the Gutta Percha would be found useful in stopping decayed teeth.

No. 288.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1847. [Sixpence.

THE SWISS CONFLICT.

BETWEEN the attacks of despotism on one side, and its own divisions on the other, political liberty is, at least in appearance, losing ground in Europe. Another of the few old free Constitutions is about to be broken up. At this moment it is more than probable that the Republic of Switzerland is engaged in a suicidal conflict; one league of Cantons is fighting with another league, and the citizens of the freest state of the Old World are committing on each other all the murderous and destructive atrocities which we are accustomed to think men are only driven to inflict by the orders of a despot. But the follies and passions of human nature do not always require influencing by a great genius like Napoleon, who used the madness of millions for his own aggrandizement. Town hates town, and province rises against province, excited not by the ambition of an individual, but arrayed against each other by a total inability to comprehend the duties of citizenship, or the sacrifices which men must make to each other, in order to preserve the existence of a political body.

It is this unfitness for rational freedom which is undermining all the Constitutions which have been created during the last half century, in imitation of that of England. There remained a hope that in the Republic, which is far more ancient than most monarchies, the people had been trained and bred to the practice and true appreciation of freedom. But there, too, the star of liberty is setting in a sea of blood. It is no matter which party conquers; the result of civil war must be the weakening of the nation, feuds, hatreds, divisions. Then appears the enemy from without, covering and excusing its interference, by appearing as the champion of peace and order; and when "order reigns," in the sense in which despots interpret the phrase, the world knows what it means—it is the desolation of a Warsaw.

The present civil conflict in Switzerland is, indeed, a sad, a disheartening, spectacle. It is frightful to take up the map of Europe, and mark the slow, insidious, but certain progress of Russia, as the incarnation of brute power, here crushing a republic, there absorbing a state, in another direction annexing a province, by force or fraud, advancing always, encroaching on Germany on the west, spreading towards Asia on the east, threatening the Moslem Empire in the south, stopped nowhere but by the ocean, and then to reflect how little root the principles of liberty have taken in some of the States of the west, how madly they are being destroyed in others. Where shall we look for the counter influence, the check against the increase of that fatal principle of arbitrary power which turns men into machines? In Austria? She is the warm ally of the Czar! In Prussia? She is the hypocritical pretender, that, with the phrases of freedom on her lips, hates it in her heart; there is not a writer of independent mind and open speech that has not been driven into exile from a land that affects to encourage literature. Freedom will find no friend in the Court of Berlin.

What are the so-called Constitutional States of Europe? France is bound hand and foot, under a Monarchy as unlimited as that of Louis Quatorze, only more disguised. What are Spain and Portugal? In both, the Constitutions are mere mockeries; in both, the tendency of the Governments is to relapse into despotisms—in other words, the people are fit for nothing else; and it may be accepted as an axiom that nations in general get the Government that reflects their own vices or virtues. If they have not the qualities of free men, they will infallibly degenerate into slaves—all charters and written constitutions to the contrary notwithstanding.

How the Despotic Powers of Europe must enjoy the spectacle of those nations that are so misusing their liberty! They are paving the way for our triumph, is their secret thought. When sufficiently exhausted by internal conflict, there may be a "partition" of Switzerland, possibly between France and Austria—that will be the consummation of the unnatural war of the Republics of Central Europe, whose existence has always been watched with an evil eye by the Powers around them.

The truth is, instead of it being the nature of men to live at peace, and in freedom with each other, it is only by great efforts, and the exercise of positive and active virtues, that either peace or liberty can be preserved. How easy it is to create confusion; a conflict is proved by all history; nay, more, though the slightest effort of reason shows the folly of destroying each other, yet, all the efforts of what are called strong Governments can scarcely, at certain periods, restrain nations from flying at each other's throats. Within the present week, the very first railway meeting that brought Englishmen and Frenchmen together was embittered by national jealousies—the old hatreds were but ill disguised. No violence, oppression, and crime, are the things to which man, undisciplined, naturally tends. Order, peace, and freedom, require the same conditions for their existence between the members of communities as between State and State. There must be some degree of self-sacrifice, some forbearance, some check on the passions; those communities where men are destitute of these virtues become anarchies, falling, sooner or later, under the power of the strongest, the most adroit bandit, or the least scrupulous executioner; States that once had a policy, like Spain and Portugal, become the mere prey of such men as a Narvaez, or a Cabral. Milton defines public virtues to be the inward spring of public liberty; those once lost, the outward forms of freedom soon follow, and the history of a State is thenceforth a chronicle of ruin.

It is this want of the freemen's virtues that gives such a deplorable interest to the civil discord of Switzerland: one of the first things a community should respect, is the religious faith of its members; it is the exercise of the virtue of tolerance. Part of the Swiss Cantons have inherited the Romish creed and worship, and they choose to think that the Jesuits make good schoolmasters; they, therefore, let that body have establishments among them, and send them their children to be taught. As each Canton is quite independent, as far as its internal Government is concerned, there is no infringement of rights in their so doing. But Berne, and the Protestant Cantons, are inspired with a hatred of the Jesuits, and declare that they shall be driven out of the Federation. The feeling is not a religious one; but the pretext serves to excuse acts of violence against the moderate and Conservative party, the strength of which lies among the Catholics. The Liberals or Radicals take arms and shoot their fellow-citizens by way of proving them in the wrong; but, as there are two parties to a battle, the Catholics resist, with the same means, and even get the advantage; the Free Corps, as they were called, being shamefully defeated in the only attack they hazarded. This was some years ago, and, since then, the quarrel has deepened and become more complicated. It is obvious that the Jesuits are the pretext; the countervail is a wider one; it is in fact the conflict between the men of "progress," and those who dislike and dread it. The tendency of the reforming party, is to a greater unity of the Republic; the Conservatives hold by the ancient federal institutions of the country. The question is whether the Sonderbund, or "separate league," formed by the Catholic Cantons among themselves, is such an infraction of the Constitution as to warrant the attempt to suppress it by armed force. That attempt will be made, and the despots of Europe will have another argument to offer to their subjects to prove the mischief of Liberty; see these free men, they say, tearing each other in pieces; how happy you ought to feel in all the safety of fetters!

SWISS STUDENTS.

THE characteristic Illustration upon the preceding page, represents a Scene recently witnessed and sketched in Berne by our own Artist—a band of young men (principally students) who paraded the streets, singing patriotic songs (in German), with strong political fureur. The Sketch reached us, direct from Berne, on Tuesday last.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

PARISIANA.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, November 2.

The present crisis in Switzerland is still engrossing the attention of our press; and while the language of the Débats, with regard to the Radical Cantons, is more virulent than formerly, the National answers it, by making an appeal to the people of all countries to rush to the aid of the Swiss Liberals. Within the last few days, however, the greater part of our Parisian contemporaries have devoted a large portion of their columns to the reproduction of several retrospective and theoretic papers, contributed by M. Lamartine to the Bien Public, a Mâcon journal under his direction. In these articles a severe condemnation was passed by the illustrious poet on the conduct of the present Cabinet; and, although his political views and principles were of a rather too speculative cast to tell on the practical statesman, there was about them the same dash of ideal and chivalrous Liberalism which, in his "Histoire des Girondins," was so effective in wiping the timid, the fastidious, and especially women, to the democratic doctrines of our Revolution. There has been, too, a good deal of stir about an anonymous pamphlet recently published, under the title of "La Présidence du Conseil de M. Guizot, et la Majorité de 1847, par un Homme d'Etat." The object of this ultra-Monarchical production could not be better summed up than in the following words, ascribed to Louis Philippe:—"After all, the Restoration was a good Government—let us continue its spirit, while eschewing its blunders." The opposition papers were unanimous in proclaiming the pamphlet to have been inspired by M. Guizot, who was, indeed, warmly commended for whatever he had done with a view to check the general movement towards civil liberty; but the attack was roughly met by the Débats, which protested in strong terms against the tenor of the work; and it is now all but positive that the anonymous writer is but M. Capefigue, a Legitimist historian, who is nothing of a statesman.

Friday, the 29th ult., being the eighth anniversary of the formation of the present Cabinet, all the Ministers were entertained by his Majesty, at St. Cloud. According to the Union Monarchique, Mr. Cunin Gridaine is not by far as likely to retire as it has been noised abroad. To say nothing of his unwillingness to do so, he has certainly a better character with the Chamber of Deputies, than M. Mauté de Bort, its rumoured successor: and this consideration is expected by the Union to prevail with the Ministry. M. Duchâtel, on another hand, is said to be in such a bad state of health that his resignation can hardly be a matter of doubt. Several measures are spoken of, which are forthwarnare of the approaching session. Baron Martinian, the Sub-Secretary of State at the department of War, is decidedly amongst the most unfavourably disposed; and it appears that other Sub-Secretaries of State, with the necessary compliment of attendant functionaries, will soon be created for the departments of Commerce, Finances, Justice, Foreign Affairs, and the Public Works. It is asserted, besides, that, among the contemplated bills to be brought forth by the Cabinet, there is one for a restitution of the Panthéon to the Catholic worship, and another for the re-establishment of the office of Great Almoner of France, with an annual civil allocation on the part of the Government, to solicit both houses to vote an anticipatory law, fixing the amount of the Civil List to be allotted to the future Regent; and this project does not seem to have been received with any very unfavourable remarks from the strong apprehensions that his Majesty is known to entertain as to the state of parties after his death. More than once he has expressed his opinion that revolutions never originate in the overthrow of a throne, and that a new government might well result from the breaking up of the Conservative party, who are likely to fluctuate between the Duke of Nemours and the Duchess of Orleans.

The latest accounts from the northernmost city confirm the report that all the men-of-war and steamers of the squadron are ordered to remain at Genoa, Spezzia, and Porto Terrajo.

The Minister of War, in concert with the Keeper of the Seals, has just appointed a Commission for adapting to the wants of Algeria the French codes, and the various civil and criminal laws connected therewith. In furtherance of the commercial interests of our colony, a Commission had been instituted to collect information respecting the traffic between the Regency of Tunis and the interior of Africa. Deputies of the Republic of the Counties have just been forwarded to the Chamber of Commerce, at Paris, and to its Secretary, at the Bourse, where one of them is left for public inspection [illegible]

The Africaine frigate, which brought him back [illegible] France, is to sail again from Brest early in this month with Admiral Ro[illegible], who is appointed to the command of the squadron stationed at the Antilles. Two of the navy have been ordered to repair to the Persian Gulf, where they are to act, in execution of the treaties between France and England for the suppression of the slave trade.

Within the last few days notice was given by the official papers that the two Commissioners appointed by M. Guizot to proceed to Syria, and enquire into the state of that country, had left Constantinople for Beyrout.

A treaty for the reciprocal recognition of copyright in matters of literature is in contemplation, it is said, between France and Russia. A weekly paper has been recently started in Paris, by M. Castille, under the title of La Propriété Littéraire, with a view to advocate the same principles respecting the copyright of artists as well as writers.

We read in the Gazette de France that all the household of Queen Christina, with her eight children, have left Paris for Madrid.

Their Excellencies the Marquis and Marquise de Normanby have returned from Chantilly to town, where they intend remaining for the winter season.

Concerning home affairs, the only fact worth mentioning is a circular letter from the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, requesting the Prefects of all their Departments to transmit to him all the information in their power as to what has been done within their respective districts, in application of the laws of April 26, 1845, and July 11, 1847, relative to the irrigation of lands. The Minister adds that he is disposed to assist in the expenses of any measures that may be opportune to promote a good system of irrigation.

On the 29th and 30th ult. the Bank of France, for the first time, made its payments with 200f. notes. In the course of these two days the new paper was issued to the amount of 15,000,000 of francs. It appears that the entire emission will be carried up to 25,000,000.

In addition to the three physicians recently commissioned to study the progress of the cholera at Trebizond, Odessa, and Moscow, Dr. Lassègue has been appointed to visit the provinces of the South on a similar mission. Moreover, the Minister of Agriculture and Commerce has just instituted a sanatory service, having its head-quarters at Paris, and called on to collect information with regard to the plague and other epidemics of the East. Five medical men, selected for this new service, are, in consequence, on the eve of setting out—M. Fauvel for Constantinople, M. Press for Alexandria, M. Barguière for Smyrna, M. Sacquet for Beyrout, and M. Aussein for Damascus.

The Cherbourg papers are filled with the saddest particulars about a catastrophe that occurred on the 26th in one of the building yards of the fort, gate-boat, acting as a breakwater to the floating dock, had been put on one of the slips for some necessary repairs; and as, under these circumstances, it was impossible for vessels to go out of the dock at high tide without great risk, it was resolved that the gate should be let down and launched on the canal; but, on the operation being performed, the fastenings of the hawsers by which she was held gave way, the boat darted down the inclined plane, snapping off all her chains, and the shores by which she was supported, as well as the handspikes of the capstans, were scattered with such a tremendous force in all directions, that seven of the workmen in the yard were killed on the spot, and thirty-six others more or less severely wounded. Two of the latter have already died in the hospital. The Minister of the Marine has given orders for relief to be afforded to the victims or their families.

At Brest, the launch of the Prony steam-sloop, of 320 horse-power, has been attended with full success; but, at Lorient, that of the Jeanne d'Arc frigate was the occasion of a most unpleasant disappointment. The Jeanne d'Arc had been built on stocks destined for men-of-war, and, when her last shores were knocked away, she only glided a little from her position, after which she came to a dead stop, from which all efforts have been powerless to force her on into the sea. The great tide of next month must, it is said, be waited for, before the launch can be effected.

On the 23rd, the Stella and Mare left Marseilles with four Lazarist Missionaries, and twelve Sisters of Charity, for China and Oceania. Four young men belonging to the best families of Paris accompany the Missionaries, and among them is a son of the Marquis of Dreux-Brézé.

The Minister of the Marine is stated to have in contemplation the establishment of a company of divers, intended to answer the various necessities of the navy, and to assist in hydrographic surveys.

The theatrical records of last week are uncommonly glorious. In right of legitimacy, the precedence belongs to the "Aristocratie," a five-act comedy, by M. St. Arago, which was produced with success at the Théâtre Français. The object of the play is to exhibit how the old nobility is worn out; how the Dukes and Barons of the Empire are rotten to the core; how the money aristocracy is impudent and vulgar; in short, how there is no true nobility but honour, virtue, and labour. In the absence of genius, there is talent enough in M. Arago's achievement to ensure it a flattering run. An opera comique, in one act, has made an equally successful appearance, under the title of "The Buccaneer." It is the first operatic performance of M. Gustave Lejeune, a gentleman who holds the station of critic-general for the musical department in one of our Parisian papers; and it proves, at any rate, that the critic knows himself how to write pretty melodies and orchestral morceaux. As to the Déjazet, a new play by Scribe, which was brought forth at the Gymnase Dramatique, it is a fantastical ballet executed in prose, instead of being delivered by eloquent mutes.

On Wednesday night, M. Sue's grand drama, "Martin et Bamboche," was favourably received by the public of our Boulevard du crime. In adapting his novel to the stage, M. Sue thought it fit to besprinkle his heroism more gentilly, and to sober down the rather too violent raisiahness of Bamboche. In the play, besides, Regina is in love with Martin, and Martin marries Regina, after a long succession of funny scenes and frolicsome extravagance.

Mdme. Viardot Garcia is said to have decidedly accepted an engagement at Drury Lane. Our third lyrical theatre, the Opera National, will open on the 6th with a pro-ogue from the pen of Messrs. Wanes and Royer, set to music by Messrs. Auber, Halevy, Carafsa, and Ad. Adam. The extraordinary offspring of so many fathers, will be followed by an opera, of "Gastebelus," from unknown parents.

SPAIN.

A curious incident occurred in Madrid on the 23rd. A person declaring himself to be the new English Minister sent to Spain by Lord Palmerston to replace Mr. Bulwer, and travelling as such, arrived here, accompanied by an escort or guard of honour. He took up his quarters for a short time at the Hotel de las Personnalines, in the Calle d'Alcala; but while he there kept himself as much concealed as possible. After remaining there some hours, he packed up his effects, called for his bill, paid it, and left the hotel. He was followed by some very curious persons, and ascertained that he entered the house of Don Salustiano Olozaga, in the Calle de las Rejas, near the Palace, where he is believed to be now concealed. It is scarcely necessary to say that this incident has excited attention. The opinion as to who the mysterious personage is is divided.

The Aurora Borealis has been seen at Madrid; it was mistaken for a fire, but has caused even more consternation than a conflagration would have done. The red rings of a portion of the phenomenon resembled flames, while not a few wanting persons who believed the phenomenon to be a forerunner of many woes to the country and the words, Guerra—guerra—guerra civil, were often heard.

The clamour raised by the press against the scandalous transaction of the conversion of the arrears of the Royal Household, into a funded debt, has forced the Government, in spite of itself, to notice it. Accordingly, a Royal order has been addressed by Orlando, Minister of Finance, to the Director-General of the Public Debt, directing him to suspend the execution of the Royal order of the 2d inst. for the conversion; and not to deliver the títulos, nor transfer the Bank shares, until such time as the Government shall have maturely examined the whole transaction.

General Narvaez has, at his own request, been relieved from the duties of the office of Minister of Foreign Affairs, and of the Presidency of the Council of [illegible]

General Serrano is on his way to Cadiz, to embark for the Canary Islands, under circumstances which leaves it doubtful whether he leaves Spain voluntarily or as an exile.

M. Salamanca, former Minister of Finance, has instituted proceedings against the editor of the Espanol, for calumniating his conduct in the affair of the conversion of the arrears due to the Queen.

PORTUGAL.

The Municipal Elections have taken place throughout Portugal; and, as the Member of the Cortes are chosen by the same electors, the result has some political significance. It will excite some surprise in England to hear that the Cabralists, against whom the attack was made, have an overwhelming majority in Lisbon. The general opinion appears to be that Cabral, with many faults, is nearly the only man who has any energy in the Kingdom. His return to power is confidently predicted, if he chooses to take the lead, after the meeting of the Cortes. The present Government continues to drag on, but no one has any confidence in it. The finances are in total confusion, and all classes are embarrassed. The Revolucao do Septembro contained the following paragraph:—"It appears that our financial agency in London is to suspend all its functions, from want of means and credit to make any transaction whatever, or to satisfy the smallest demands."

One item of the intelligence from Portugal is very satisfactory; the Port wine vintage of the present year has been magnificent. Letters from the Douro state that the weather has not only been fine, but most appropriate throughout the whole month of September and the first week in October, affording ample time for the careful gathering of the largest and finest fruit of the vintage. The grapes are generally perfectly ripe, with a flavour more than ordinarily fine, which, if retained after fermentation, will in all probability make a distinguished year. Not a defective grape went into the "vat," and nothing [illegible] professional.

The Queen Dowager and suite left Lisbon on the 27th inst. in H.M.S. Hone for Madeira.

Colonel Sir Horace Seymour and the Dowager Lady Clinton, who went out in the suite of the Queen Dowager to Lisbon, have returned home in the Terrible. He also have Commander Thomas Miller and Lieutenant Arthur Warre, on promotion, from her Majesty's ship Caledonia.

GERMANY

M. Munch Bellinghausen, President of the German Diet, had left Frankfort on a political mission of the Austrian Cabinet to the Cabinets of Munich, Stuttgard, and Carlsruhe. His journey was avowedly undertaken to [illegible] Switzerland, and he was to proceed to Vienna after visiting these different Courts.

The King of Hanover had refused to grant an exequatur to M. Westphalen, before the Prussian diplomatist had allayed Protestantism and become a Catholic. "It is the second time," says the Commerce (a Paris journal), "that King Ernest has manifested his intolerance in religious matters. A year ago he dismissed his representative at the Court of Berlin (Count de Hardenberg), for having abjured Protestantism in favour of Catholicism. The conduct of King [illegible] M. Westphalen, so extraordinary as it appears when the Paris [illegible] of France admit Israelites amongst their members, is, more-Government of Frederick William, who is at least as orthoover, in accordance with the views of the Government of Frederick William, who is at least as orthodox in Hanoverian Majesty [illegible]

ITALY.

LOSS OF THE STEAMER "BONAPARTE."—The following particulars of this disaster are from the pen of a passenger on board the Bonaparte, at the time of the occurrence, on her passage from Marseilles to Italy. She had touched at Basila, and was continuing her voyage across to Leghorn, on Thursday night the 14th ult., when she was met by another steamer, the Comte de Parra. A collision took place at midnight: the Bonaparte had her stern cut in two, and soon went down; three lives were lost, and the rest of the passengers were with difficulty saved by the other steamer, most of them in their night-dresses, while their personal effects, with all other property on board, went to the bottom. The Bonaparte, which was a screw vessel, had set out from Marseilles on Tuesday morning, the 12th ult. The weather, which had been stormy, had become beautiful, and most of the passengers had retired to rest at the time of the accident. The Comte de Parra was herself very seriously injured, a large hole having been made in her bow a few inches above water [illegible]

The Sultan has sent Chekib Effendi to the Pope to express his desire that the protection of the Christians of the Libanus should take place in a direct manner by the intervention of a representative of the Holy See. The Pope, moved by this overture, has just re-established the office of Patriarch of Jerusalem, and raised to that dignity a simple monastery inmate.

SWITZERLAND.

The affairs of Switzerland continue in the same disturbed and threatening position. The Federal Diet are preparing for war, but without being quite resolved on commencing hostilities; there is division in their councils; the Cantons of the Sonderbund are also prepared for the conflict, and, if their forces are inferior in numbers, they are animated by a much more enthusiastic spirit—their resistance will be a determined one.

Since the Diet had issued a decree, calling out 50,000 troops, the greatest activity prevailed in the staff departments, and the last orders for the levy of the entire force had been given. On the afternoon of the 26th orders had not been issued for the troops under arms to march, but the greater number of the Cantons had anticipated the orders of the Diet. Zurich, Argau, and Thurgovia, had placed their first contingent under arms. Vaud had levied fourteen battalions; Soleure and Glaris each one battalion; and Berne will have, on the 28th of October, fifteen battalions under arms. The Cantons of the Sonderbund, on their side, were not idle. Not only had they rendered several roads impracticable, and placed mines under different approaches, but they were daily increasing their army. They raised recently, in Valais, armed them with cannon, and they had occupied the fortress of S. Maurice in the Valais, which belongs to the Confederation.

The federal representatives had all returned to Berne, after their unsuccessful expedition. In the Cantons of the Sonderbund, the population of Uri, Schwyts, and Unterwald, are firmly determined to make an obstinate resistance to the Diet, as they declare that they fight for their hereditary liberty to be at stake, and there is no doubt but they will defend themselves valiantly, if attacked. In the Canton of Uri the population has uttered the most furious threats against the federal representatives. The Cantons of Zug, Lucerne, Fribourg, and the Lower Valais, who use the French language, are less disposed to fight. In the Sonderbund Canton, the Commander-in-Chief was obliged to disband an entire battalion, and two other battalions proposed a toast to the Confederation. In the meantime, large bodies of Austrian and French troops have approached the Swiss frontiers.

Salis de Soglio, the General of the Army of the Sonderbund, has issued a stirring and eloquent proclamation to the Catholic Cantons, appealing to all those old military associations of which the Swiss are so proud, exhorting them to imitate their ancestors in resisting tyranny and oppression. On the other hand, General Dufour, the Commander of the Radical troops, is described as wanting in resolution and decision. He only accepted the chief command, after a long struggle with himself, as if he had doubted the legality of the war. He scarcely, indeed, belongs to the Radical party: he is one of those feeble and irresolute beings who, during revolutions, always finish by suffering themselves to be carried away in the current of the most violent opinions. The conditions imposed on him and the terms of the oath which he was required to take were, moreover, well calculated to increase his natural dislike to accept the command. That the Radicals are very much the reverse of liberal in their policy is evident from the conditions they have imposed on their General, whose views are looked upon, first, by distrust. First, a representative of the people is to accompany General. The object may be easily divined. He will represent the eye and the arm of the Radicals of the Directory. He will watch the General's every movement; he will receive his instructions from Berne, and dictated by the Bear Club; and if the war be not conducted according to the will of the representative, the General will be recalled. This measure is a direct imitation of the system during the first Revolution, when a General who did not succeed was invariably deposed, sent to Paris, and guillotined.

General Dufour at first refused to accept that humiliating position. A discussion, which soon degenerated into a quarrel, arose between him and several of the members of the Diet. M. Ochsenbein reproached him with having chosen officers to command the Radical army who, for the most part, belonged to the Moderate party. He replied that he would either not command the army, or he would choose capable and honourable Lieutenants. It is, in fact, a singular position in which the Radicals who now govern Switzerland are placed: they have the chance of being raised to the service of society so many men who ought to have remained at the bottom. But it appears—as yet, at least—that the command of an army requires other qualifications, and the Radicals have not found anyone to whom they can entrust the command of the army prepared to act against the Sonderbund could be intrusted. Compelled to abandon the command of the army to a General whose political opinions are not in unison with theirs, they submit to the choice, and have placed a watch over him. According to the latest intelligence, hostilities are daily expected to break out.

SWEDEN.

The King of Sweden, by a decree of the 16th ult., had ordered that all vessels arriving from Russian and Irish harbours should be subjected to certain sanatory precautions, and that those from Irish ports should be free of patents should be found, should not be permitted to communicate with the shore, and be placed in quarantine.

TURKEY.

According to the latest advices, General Grivas continued to be treated with the highest distinction by the Ottoman authorities of Janina, where his partisans were only allowed to retain their arms on the payment of the first instalment of the bounty of the Sultan. Hafiz Pasha, the Governor, had proposed to Grivas a high rank in the Turkish army, which the latter refused to accept, although, at his first interview with the Governor, he received a present of 5,000 men, with which he promised to reduce Greece, in the course of six weeks, under the dominion of the Sultan. Since the death of Colletti, however, he had become a warm Greek partisan again. At the date of the last intelligence from Janina he was engaged in an active correspondence with the discontented of the frontier provinces, which he evidently intended to invade.

INDIA.

Letters from India, in anticipation of the Overland Mail of the 30th of September, have been received. The dates are from Bombay to the 30th, Madras to the 20th, and Calcutta to the 13th of September.

The utmost tranquillity prevailed throughout India.

Mr. Pringle, of the civil service, had replaced Sir Charles Napier in Scinde with the rank of Commissioner. Brigadier Grant had been raised to the command of the troops.

The Governor-General was to leave the hills early in October, intending, it was said, to proceed in the first instance to Cawnpore, where he would have an interview with the King of Oude; and it was believed that Lord Hardinge intended on that occasion to come to an arrangement with the King to induce him to make over his regal authority, in order that efficient steps might be taken to arrest the increasing disorganisation and misrule of that province.

In return, his Majesty was to be offered a handsome pension, secured on a portion of the revenues of Oude, upon condition that he should cede all political authority from our hands, or the administration, for part of the withdrawal by proclamation of the support we had hitherto afforded him, thus leaving his fate to be decided by his subjects.

It was not doubted but that the King would accept the liberal terms of regal wealth and pageantry which would be offered, since, addicted to luxury, he ill supports the cause of a distracted and impoverished state, where the revenue [illegible] to the collection of 50,000 rupees.

Some similar arrangements were said to be in contemplation with respect to the Government of Nizam, but the measures likely to be enforced at Hyderabad would not be of so decided a character as those to be used there, from the somewhat better character of the Prince. It was thought that he would be permitted to retain his authority upon certain liberal concessions to be made to his subjects.

The state of the Punjaub continued to be such as to be most satisfactory. Besides the imprisonment of the dissolute Runee, or Queen Mother, the instigator of the late war, and who was still, it is said, engaged in every species of intrigue against the authority, the Lahore Durbar issued, with due proclamations, one abolishing infanticide and suttee, and the other announcing the suppression of forced labour. The imprisonment of the Queen, who formerly went by the title of "the Sikh Mother," had excited the most popular commotion.

The eldest son of the Maharajah of Cashmere was on his way to visit the Governor-General at Simla, to take leave of his Lordship in his father's name, preparatory to Lord Hardinge's departure for England.

The Dacoit chief Doongar Singh had been captured in Rajpootana, but not until a force of 6000 men had taken the field in various directions against him.

By general orders, dated "Simla, Sept. 8," her Majesty's 31st and 54th Regiments were directed to be held in readiness to embark for England.

Trade had somewhat improved both at Calcutta and Bombay.

The following casualties by death in the armies of India, since the departure of the 11th of September, are reported in the papers received by this [illegible] that purpose, brought from the New Hebrides group of South Sea Islands (distant three weeks sail from Sydney) 68 of the natives of various ages, from 14 to 35. Much eagerness was shown on the part of the natives to accompany Mr. Boyd, which is attributed to their suffering during eight months of the year, from a scarcity of food amounting to the severity of famine. Though inflammable and cannibalism prevail amongst them, their tractability is such, as to afford the most encouraging hopes of the total eradication of those frightful habits from amongst them, and of their becoming fitted for civilized life. The occupation they are intended for is that of shepherds. The cost of their introduction was £8 per man.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

OPENING OF MICHAELMAS TERM.—THE LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEJEUNER.—Tuesday being the first day of Term, the Lord Chancellor gave his customary entertainment to the Judges, Queen's Counsel, &c., at his Lordship's mansion, in Park-lane. At half-past ten o'clock his Lordship was waited upon by the Recorder, the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex, &c. &c., when the ceremony of introducing the Lord Mayor elect took place. At twelve o'clock the Judges began to arrive, each wearing state robes. The Lord Chancellor received his visitors in the drawing-room. Their Lordships did not enter their respective Courts until half-past one o'clock.

CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

On Monday William Ashcroft, aged 39, of respectable appearance, was indicted, before the Common Sergeant, for a misdemeanour, in having unlawfully and maliciously cast a number of stones upon the line of the Eastern Counties Railway, with intent to obstruct the passage of a certain engine and train travelling thereupon, and thereby endangering the safety of the passengers. It appeared that on the preceding Monday a gentleman, named Johnson, while angling in the river Lea, observed a number of stones upon the line, and, immediately afterwards, heard the sound of something like stones striking upon the railway, but he took no particular notice of the proceeding at first, supposing the defendant might be engaged upon the line by the Company. In a short time the defendant went up to him, and he asked him if he had been clearing the line, to which he replied in the negative; and, while they were conversing, the half-past four o'clock down train came along the line; and, upon Mr. Johnson making a remark to that effect, the prisoner looked very confused and walked away. The train came up at the rate of twenty miles an hour, and the engineer having given a signal of danger, the guard put on the break, and the train was stopped, fortunately without any injury being occasioned; for it appeared that a number of large paving-stones, some of them weighing 30lb., had been placed upon the rails, and that the engine had gone over several of them, crushing them to pieces; the "life guards," as they are termed, which are pieces of iron running in front of the fore wheels of the engine, having pushed several others off the rails. Upon further search, a portion was found that a number of the same description of stones had also been placed upon the up-line, an up-train being expected almost immediately; and, indeed, it appeared almost miraculous from the manner in which the rails were encumbered, that one train or the other had not been thrown off the line, the consequences of which must have, in all probability, involved a fearful loss of life. The prisoner ran away, and endeavoured to make his escape, but was pursued by the guards of the train and taken into custody; and, when before the Magistrate, he admitted that he had placed the stones upon the rails, but said he could not tell what induced him to do so, other than that he was "out of humour." He denied any intention to injure any one. Mr. Meller addressed the Jury for the prisoner, and called several witnesses in proof of previous good character. Verdict—"Guilty." Sentence—Imprisonment, with hard labour, for two years.

A special session of this Court was held on Tuesday, in accordance with the provisions of the Provisional Insolvent Act, for the purpose of fixing the days for holding the sessions for the ensuing year. At half-past eleven o'clock the Lord Mayor entered the Old Court, accompanied by Mr. Baron Parke, Mr. Baron Alderson, Mr. Justice Patteson, Mr. Justice Coleridge, Mr. Justice Coltman, Mr. Justice Maule, Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Justice Erle, Mr. Baron Rolfe, Mr. Baron Platt, and Mr. Justice Williams. POLICE.

BOW-STREET.

On Saturday, a young man, named John Rains, was charged by Sergeant Ashman, F, with being found concealed in the churchyard of St. Paul's, Covent-garden, supposed for the purpose of committing felonies. The officer, who was crouching between two graves, pretending to be asleep; on the ground beside him was the stock of a centre-bit. The officer searched him, and found upon him a turnscrew, with a chisel, a dark lantern, and a life-preserver of a most murderous description, and in his trousers pockets two centre-bits, seven keys (each of which had double wards), with a box of lucifer matches. On the sill of Mr. Elkin's window, which opens into the churchyard, and is a sliverarch, in King-street, there was a large sheet of brown paper, lying near where the prisoner lay, one side of which was lined with a coating of thick paste, or other adhesive substance, by which those panes could be removed with the greatest facility, after the centre-bits were used, without disturbing the slumbers of the domestics. The prisoner was remanded.

MANSION-HOUSE.

On Monday, the Lord Mayor read a letter, exposing the practices of those persons who advertise "respectable situations" as vacant, offering the appointment for "a premium." His Lordship's correspondent states:—"In the Times of or about September 13, there appeared an advertisement from a party signed 'L. S. D.,' to procure a situation as secretary to a public company, at a salary of between £200 and £300 a year, and stating that a premium was expected. In my reply to this advertisement, I stated that 'I should consider any communication on the subject as strictly private and confidential.' He called at an address named, " which appeared to be the general office of some Kensington Proprietorial Transit Company. I found one man writing, who appeared to know my business. He told me Mr. C—— had not yet arrived, but took me into a small room to sit down. With the exception of chairs, stools, desks, &c., I observed nothing of the slightest value, and no books or papers, so that there was nothing except features and the solitary clerk, and they appeared not to have been swept for a month. After waiting half an hour, a shabby-dressed boy came in, and I was ushered me into the presence of a person whom I considered to be Mr. C——, but he said he was not that person, and would not tell me his name. He inquired in a very meagre manner if I had got the money, and I told him certainly not, and would it be obtained unless satisfactory explanations were given. He said he could not explain more than that a first-rate company was about to be established, of which he could not at present tell me the name or the place of business, but would allow their secretary £600 a year, he, not residing in town, was to employ a sub. at £200 a year, with a clerk under him, the salary to commence from Christmas, and to be payable quarterly." For the appointment to this desirable situation, the Company required £400 to be advanced by the candidate, on the security of "two highly respectable gentlemen." The writer was informed, as a stimulus to the production of the money, that there were already "197 applications" for the vacancy. The cash was not produced, and the whole affair appeared so suspicious, that the writer felt bound to make an exposure of the mode of proceeding, which, however, is by no means a novel one.

On the same day, a gentleman waited on the Lord Mayor, and described another species of robbery, apparently new, and which publicity may tend to check. "He was called upon by a Pole, while in the country, who exhibited a quantity of watches, chains, seals, and other articles of jewellery, and solicited him to become a purchaser. The Pole, who seemed to understand his business perfectly well, said that he was the agent of a very extensive company, to whom the immediate payment of the amount of any articles was no object, and who would be satisfied to receive it at the rate of a trifle per week or month, as was most suitable to the convenience of the customer. Under these circumstances he (Mr. ——) was led with the applicant, which was worth no more than £4, or at most £4 10s., and the Pole departed, gratified at the sale. No more was heard about him until about three weeks subsequently, when the gentleman was astonished at receiving a London lawyer's letter for the sum of twelve guineas, and immediately afterwards the copy of a writ."

MARYLEBONE

ROBBERY BY A SHOPWOMAN. Ann Simons was re-examined on Tuesday last, charged with having plundered her employers, Messrs. Marshall and Co., Vere-street, Oxford-street, of property to the amount of about £2000. B. Simons, her father, was charged with being an accessory. The prisoner had been three years in the employ of the prosecutors, who had ascertained that an extensive system of robbery had been going on; and, from inquiries instituted, it turned out that the female prisoner was the perpetrator thereof. Articles of great value, belonging to Messrs Marshall and Co., were discovered in her boxes, in one of which was found the card of Mr. Hickman, in whose chambers were various articles in dresses, &c., which, as it turned out, had been left there by Ann Simons, who was in the habit of visiting Mr. Hickman. Other property was found at the house of the prisoner Benjamin Simons, the father. Mr. Clarkson, for the prosecution, intimated that a son of the elder prisoner was suspected of being mixed up in the transaction. His (Mr. C.), however, was not prepared at present to go into evidence implicating him, and he wished for a remand.—Mr. Ballantine, on the part of Mr. Hickman, said: Mr. H. is a merchant of fortune, and he had numerous friends in court who were ready to come forward and testify to his respectability; he had formed an unfortunate attachment to Ann Simons, but he knew not that she had deposited any of the Marshalls' property in his chambers. As soon as he received intimation of the robbery, he lost no time in giving information to the parties alleged to have been plundered by the girl, Ann Simons. The prisoners were remanded, and Mr. Hickman was bailed, himself in £100, and two sureties in £200 each, for his attendance.

PUBLIC HEALTH.

SEVERAL statements have recently appeared relative to the progress of the Cholera in Russia; as they are calculated to excite alarm, we take the opportunity of bringing under the public notice some circumstances that should diminish its apprehensions; at the same time, it would not be prudent to neglect those sanitary measures which, especially in populous cities and towns, are the best security against epidemics. The authorities cannot be too strict in enforcing cleanliness, and we are glad to observe that the Vestry of Marylebone have been ordered by the Sanatory Committee to send in to them all the information as to the local circumstances that may affect the Public Health which may be in its possession.

The facts which ought to mitigate the fears felt as to the progress of the Cholera are principally these:—Its course is not the same as in 1832, as it moves from North to East, and very slowly; in the year just named, its progress was from the East to the North and South-West. It then appeared rapidly, and within a short time was raging in Russia, Poland, Prussia, Austria, England, and France; at this moment it has already ceased in the ports of the Sea of Azof; in addition to this fact, it is satisfactory to know, from the official report in the Journal de St. Petersburg, that where it appeared the symptoms were of a milder character than in 1832, that few were attacked, and that of those affected a great proportion recovered; this was more marked in those cases where medical aid was resorted to. It was most fatal among those who had been previously attacked by the fever of the country:—

"At this moment," says the Gazette, "the malady exists only in a small number of localities; in the Government of Stavropol; on this side of the mountains, its intensity is sensibly diminishing." It is added "The majority of those who fell sick belonged to the lower classes of the population, without distinction of age or sex. It was, however, remarked that the male exceeded the female patients in the ratio of five to one; that adults were attacked in preference to children; and in general a far greater number of Russians than of Mahometans or Kalmucks, who form a considerable portion of the population of Astrakan. This last fact is easily explained by the mode of living adopted by each; the Mahometans, in general, keep themselves cleaner, are better and more warmly clad, even in summer and are very sober and careful in their diet; and as to the Kalmucks, a nomad nation, their inability to sustenance attacks to greatly diminished by their custom of constantly living in the open air, and inhaling the pure, bracing atmosphere of the steppes."

Sobriety, cleanliness, and exercise in the open air, are the best preventives, for these reports the Russians have much to learn; their clothes and houses are disgustingly filthy, and, as a race, they are the most drunken on the face of the earth. If we add to these their wretched diet, we shall cease to wonder that the Cholera and epidemics of a kindred type make such ravages among them. All writers on the disease have pointed out how strongly habitual intoxication predisposes the system to infection. Dr. Haj says (in Bengal, when last prevalent in England, according to the experience of Dr. Elliotson, was very fatal amongst spirit-drinkers; and it is now a well-known fact, that that portion of the lower orders who had overpaying calculated to keep them in good health, but who indulged in spirit-drinking, were sure to suffer; and, however well persons may be off, if they enfeeble their bodies by dissipation, they are rendered increasingly liable to attacks of Cholera. Mr. Grenchow, of Newcastle, and all medical men who have paid attention to this disease, have remarked that Cholera always attacks the broken down in constitution, the dissolute, and the abject poor; those devoid of proper bodily comforts, whether in lodgings, food, or diet; those enfeebled by age, and especially, the inhabitants of low, dirty, crowded, and ill-ventilated situations

The French Government has procured from its agents and Consuls in Russia every information they could collect relative to the Cholera, and it follows, from the whole of the documents received at the Foreign Office, that the scourge presented this year, in Russia, a less fatal character than it had last visited that country. The Russian and French authorities thus confirm each other, and the statements of both ought to diminish the alarm that has prevailed.

Most of the specifics published as remedies for the Cholera are worthless, and calculated to do more harm than good. But preventive remedies are, in many cases, prudent. The following is recommended by Dr. Searle (late of the East India Company's Madras Establishment), who "in his long practice had experience in cases of Cholera perhaps of any man living." He says:—"From the force of circumstances in which some persons are placed, in despite of their best endeavours to prevent them, derangements of health will occur. Diarrhœa, take place: in which case, in the majority of instances, the following pills will be found a most excellent remedy:—Calomel, Socotrine aloes, and Castile soap, of each 20 grains, made into twelve pills. One taken at bed-time for one day, and the next, two, or three nights, or the half of one reduced to powder, and mixed with a little jelly for a child, will increase the secretion of bile, and tend thereby to purify the blood, open the bowels, and excite all the functions of the body into action, with suitable abstinence, materially prevent the accession of Cholera or any disease; and further, should it fail in so doing, it will, nevertheless, prepare effectually the way for such other treatment as the case may be found more essentially to require."

In fact, it may be doubted whether the danger from the Cholera is so great as that we are continually liable to from fevers of the typhoid class, engendered by dirt and destitution, in the midst of us, and in the present year fatally increased by the influx of a pauper population from Ireland, infected with those types of disease which always attend a famine. In Liverpool, typhus fever was very prevalent, and still exists; it is permanent in Glasgow, and in Edinburgh its progress continues unabated.

Among its victims of the more comfortable class of society, is the Surgeon of the Police Establishment. Not the least remarkable of the melancholy features of the calamity, is the dreary, hopeless apathy with which the working classes—the members of which are the chief sufferers—submit to their fate on the present, as on all former similar occasions, without once bestirring themselves in any wise to remedy the evil. It is suggested that the best information which could be furnished to the Legislature, with a view to the enactment of a few effective remedial sanatory measure, would be that which would be embodied in a report drawn up by some of the many intelligent operatives who witness in their own immediate circles the frightful ravages of the epidemic.

It is against the causes of this permanent state of disease that our efforts should be directed, in London and the provinces. The things more particularly to be attended to," says Dr. Hale, "are ventilation and the cleanliness of our towns, great moderation both in eating and drinking. It is also necessary to cause and purify the public streets before attending to the ventilation of the houses on either side of them; for of what advantage to the poor inmates is a stream of air carrying to each hearth the seeds of death upon its wings, and bringing the exhalations from privies, drains, sewers, slaughter-houses, and filthy trenches of the Thames and other rivers into which our towns are at present drained—a most abominable contrivance, and one of the chief causes of typhus fever and other diseases. Nor is also much desired by the vast crowds arising from the churchyards, which are so contrived as to make the cities of the living the cities of the dead also; our present modes of burial undoubtedly making the dead people kill the living." Some sanitary reform will be worth anything, unless it at once abolishes this horrible practice.

THE BIRMINGHAM AND OXFORD RAILWAY.—On Saturday, an application was made by Mr. Eade, on behalf of the dissentient shareholders, before Mr. Baron Platt, to the effect that proceedings should be stayed in those cases where writs had been served by the Directors on those shareholders who refused to pay the last call, the object being to save expense; and proposing, further, that any decision in one of those cases should be taken as conclusive in the others. Mr. Baron Platt decided that proceedings should be stayed as sought for, but he declined imposing any restriction.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.—Twenty-seven States compose that incorporation or confederacy which is called the American Union. Nine of these, being mainly the old north-eastern settlements, together with the westernmost province of Missouri, have no public debt such as we now speak of. Of the remaining eighteen, nine have honestly met their liabilities without suspension, viz.:—Massachusetts, New York, Ohio, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Alabama; and nine have practically repudiated debts to levy taxes on an unwilling population, and, at length, so far succeeded as to resume payments in February, 1845. Of the eight remaining States in this black list, four place themselves beyond the pale of hope, in cases where writs had been served by the Directors on those shareholders who refused to pay nobody. These are Maryland, Louisiana, Indiana, and Illinois. The latter of their boast is "repudiation from principle;" the second, we should be loth to deprive them of the credit due for at least taking their public debt into public consideration, although the national conscience was exercised with very equivocal tests in the arrangement proposed for meeting it. Maryland is entitled to greater praise. She did impose taxes shortly after her failure, has acknowledged the durability of her obligations, and has even made a beginning towards the liquidation of her arrears. The four States which remain—Michigan, Mississippi, Florida, and Arkansas—have as yet met all claims of principal, interest, and arrears, by emphatic repudiation. Not only have they thrown out of hotter prospects being an unanimous [illegible] that the first of them aims to take rank eventually among solvent States, but upon what terms, or at what period, has not been closed.

The Council of Salubrity of Paris has postponed a measure, frequently suggested, to prevent the fatal accidents that have occurred from the use of arsenic instead of fine and pellucid powder. The Council directs that all persons who, whether for the destruction of vermin or otherwise, keep arsenic on their premises, should mix with it Prussian blue, to change the colour, and sugar comme, the bitterness of which would immediately cause the presence of arsenic to be detected by the taste of that ingredient. A small quantity of Prussian blue and sugar comme cannot interfere with the lawful, while it may be occasionally a great obstacle in the way of the unlawful use of this poison. BENEDICTION OF THE MUNICIPAL BANNERS AT THE QUIRINAL

AFFAIRS OF ROME.

By aid of our Artist in Rome, we are enabled to illustrate two of the most striking scenes in the recent commemorations of the great political movement. One represents the formal reading of the motu proprio decree on the organisation of the Municipal Council of Rome, which is to assume the name of Senate. The Council is to consist of 100 members, namely, 64 proprietors; 32 lawyers, savans, artists, bankers, merchants, &c.; and four representing the ecclesiastical body. The Municipality will be composed of a Senator or Mayor, and eight Deputy Mayors, who were first to be chosen by the Government, and afterwards to be elected by the Council. The members of the latter are to be renewed by thirds annually.

The companion Illustration presents the celebration of the above event, on the evening of the same day, when the entire population of Rome repaired to Monte Cavallo, the residence of the Pope, to congratulate his Holiness. The city was brilliantly illuminated; and the people carried torches, and flags from the different States. On reaching Monte Cavallo, the flag of Ferrara took precedence of the others, and was borne under the balcony, from whence the Pope usually pronounces his benediction. The bearer then raised the flag, and cried, in a stentorian voice, "Saint Père délivrer moi de l'étranger." Loud acclamations followed; the Pope, having given his benediction, retired from the balcony, and the crowd separated in as orderly a manner as if they had just left church.

A recent letter from Rome says:—"Addresses arrive from all the provinces of the Roman States, each more strongly than the other expressing the devoted love and attachment of the people for their Sovereign. It has been decided that a monument shall be erected on the Pincian Hill, in honour of Pius IX., and perpetuating the memory of his having instituted the Civic Guard. It will be formed of the magnificent antique column preserved in the court of the Palace on Monte Cetorio. On the top will be placed a statue of Clemency; below will be the four cardinal virtues; and on the pedestal bassi relievi, in allusion to the institution of the Civic Guard. The idea was given by Prince Piombino and Ciciruacchio, and M Camevali, the architect, has made the designs. The cost is to be covered by voluntary subscriptions. The receipts are expected to exceed the expense, and the surplus is to be applied in the purchase of artillery for the Civic Guard. A letter from Venice announces that the city is about to send eight remarkably fine pieces of cannon as a present to his Holiness."

WANGANUI, THE SCENE OF THE LATE CONFLICT.

In our Journal of last week, we recorded the substance of the intelligence just received, of the attack by the Maories, upon the settlement of Wanganui. We are now enabled to present our readers with an illustration of the precise locality of the affray, from a Sketch by a Correspondent. The scene is Wanganui and its environs, from the south side of the river. The first house on the left is that of Mr. Churton, described in the letter just received, as the last plundered by the New Zealanders, and within gun-shot of the stockade and the gun-boat. The two chiefs, Maketu and Tuiua, who were killed, were quarrelling in Mr. Churton's house, about the division of the plunder, and were both shot together.

In a second letter, it is stated that the Governor (Grey) has consented to the partial release of Te Rauparaha. The terms are, Tomate Waka and Te Wharo Where are to become bail for him. He is to be taken to Auckland with "Charley," one of his Chiefs. Te Wharo Where is to detain him at Waikato until the country is quiet, and, on receiving on order from the Governor, will release him. There are various opinions upon this measure.

The writer (the Times Correspondent) adds:—"Individually, I consider it a very bold stroke of policy in Captain Grey, and if it succeed (as, from minute inquiry, I believe it will), it will do more to quiet the country than five battles. The Wanganui Maories will be left alone, and the easier to subdue. Te Wharo Where has never been known to injure a white man, through a life of 70 years. Tomate Waka has fought twenty-six battles for white men. Waka ben came answerable for Pomare, Kawiti, and Johnny Heke in the north, who have all been quiet since. Te Rauparaha is the only one who has influence over Rangihaieta, and thus he may succumb, and the country be peaceable. Kanae, Rauparaha's other Chief, now a prisoner in her Majesty's ship Calliope, is to be released at Portirua, and he will see all Rauperaha's allies there, and explain the whole affair to them. He (Kanae) has just now offered to bring all his men down to put them at the Government's disposal, if wanted.'

The locality is thus described in Mr. Brees's beautiful "Illustrations of New Zealand" (lately published by Williams and Co., Strand):—

"There is a small settlement at Wanganui, between New Plymouth and Port Nicholson, where the town of Petre is laid out. It is a beautiful district, with an agreeable climate, and altogether forms a delightful site for a settlement. The hills bound the river on the east, and Mounts Egmont, at Taranaki, and Tongariro, another snowy mountain, terminate the landscape northward. The river is only safe for small coasters, although a vessel of 300 tons has been taken in."

The little settlement of Petre has always been a favourite with residents and visitors. It was laid out for the holders of the secondary series of land orders of the New Zealand Company. In our view are shown the church, and most of the houses of the settlers. The number of acres in cultivation at Wanganui in the year 1844, amounted to 103½, of which 63½ acres were in wheat.

The companion Print to the View of Petre, shows a specimen of one of the native Pahs (in Patitkiwaranui), Wanganui.

We briefly described the Pah, in our notice of Mr. Brees's work. The following, more in detail, is from Mr. G. F. Angas's "Savage Life and Scenes in Australia and New Zealand:"—

"The New Zealander has a fixed and settled habitation: he resides either in his pah, which is a fortified stockade; or in a Kainga Maori, or native settlement, which is not enclosed, where the houses are scattered about as in a village. In times of warfare the whole tribe seeks refuge within the pah, which is often erected on the summit of a steep hill, or on an island, or along the bank of a river. The pah is surrounded with a strong, high fence, or stockade; and the interior is divided, by lower fencings, into numerous court-yards, which communicate with each other by means of stiles; in each court stands the house and cook-house of one or more families, and also the patuka, or storehouse for food. The dwelling-house, and frequently the storehouse, is ornamented with grotesque carving, and coloured with kokowai, or red ochre. The cook-house is merely a shed, built of posts or slabs of wood placed several inches apart, so as to admit the air and wind, and roofed with beams, over which is a thatchwork of raupo: in these houses the domestic operations of cooking and preparing food, cori, &c., take place during wet weather; at other times they are carried on in the open air. The houses are partly sunk in the ground, and a true native house is always built with a gable roof and a portico or verandah, where the occupants generally sit. The inner chamber, which extends a long way back, serves as a sleeping apartment, and towards evening is heated by means of a fire; after the family enters for the night, the door and window are tightly closed, and in this almost suffocating atmosphere they pass the night: when day comes, they creep out of the low door into the sharp morning air, dripping with perspiration.

"Within the enclosure of the pah also stand the wahi tapu, or burial-places of the chiefs, which, being coloured red and ornamented with rich carving and a profusion of feathers, are attractive objects to a stranger. At the natives at certain seasons of the year are constantly in their plantations and potato-grounds, they erect in them temporary sheds, and long thatched buildings, beneath which to repose in wet weather, and also for the purpose of cooking their food. In the plantations, patukas or storehouses are also frequent, in which they deposit the seed during the winter: these patukas are always raised upon a pole, or placed between the forked branches of a tree, to preserve them from the attacks of the rats which overrun both islands.

"Some of their pahs are very extensive, and contain a population of 1000 to 2000 people; others are much smaller, and are inhabited merely by one chief, with his family and dependents. Since the introduction of Christianity amongst the New Zealanders, the use of these fortifications is become less constant, and in whole districts the natives may be seen dwelling at peace in their scattered houses, without either wall or fence to protect them from an enemy."

Further intelligence was received from New Zealand, on Tuesday, by H.M.S. Castor, which quitted in the middle of July. Constant skirmishes were going on between the natives and the British troops and inhabitants, and all boats going on shore were compelled to be armed.

HOUSTON'S ELECTRIC TELEGRAPH.—The Electric Telegraph on the Baden Railway was opened on the 15th of October last. In accordance with the recommendation of a Commission, appointed by the Government, they adopted Houston's Patent Gold Leaf Telegraph, and Professor Eisenlohr, of Carlsruhe, who has been appointed to superintend it, reports that each one wore only information is being transmitted at the rate of thirty letters a minute; whilst the most complicated apparatus, and one that costs ten times as much, and requires a much more powerful current of electricity, gives not more than sixty or seventy letters per minute, and is not so certain in its action.

BOULOGNE AND AMIENS RAILWAY COMPANY.—A General Meeting of the Shareholders (French and English) of this Company was held in Paris, on Saturday last, in Hertz's Rooms, Rue de la Victoire, which was rendered remarkable by the exhibition of that petty feeling of national jealousy which characterises some sections of the two communities at either side of the Channel. The English shareholders were, it appears, for many reasons dissatisfied with the conduct of the Directors, MM Lafitte, Blount, and Cally St. Paul, and have been for some time past "nursing their wrath to keep it warm" for the day of reckoning against Messieurs du triumvirat. The place of meeting, on the eventful day, seemed like the scene of an approaching national contest, and the tone of the proceedings throughout was in unison with the character impressed on them at the commencement. The nature of this may be gathered from the circumstance of the French portion of the assembly obstinately opposing any attempt on the part of the English to address the meeting in their own language, and absolutely "putting down" by clamour the shareholders who endeavoured to make themselves heard in English. M. Seguier, who acted as Secretary, read the Directors' report and statement of accounts, and it was in the course of the explanations that followed that the anti-English disruption of the entente cordiale fully developed itself. The loudly expressed dissatisfaction of an Englishman with the ominous name of all others of Pritchard, did not in any degree mitigate the asperity of the feeling evinced, not against British gold, but British citizens; and, on the question of the passing of the Directors' accounts, which was the goal of the contest, the votes were—in favour of them, 516; and against them, 417; the children of Perfide Albion running the sons of La Grande Nation thus close upon their own ground.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1847.

One of the police cases of the past week furnishes another proof of the flourishing existence of a system often complained of, but which no effectual steps have been taken to destroy. A little German boy was picked up in the street and brought to the Mansion-House, one of the hundreds of foreign children imported, year after year, by the speculators in the misplaced charity of the English public. The children are sent out every day with their instruments of torture—organs and pianos—and, by the dreadful nuisance of the noise, or their pertinacity in begging, they, in a manner, extort a few pence from the lovers of peace, merely to get rid of them. But, not a farthing of the money goes into their own pockets: all is rendered up to the master, who, perhaps, is walking about Leicester-square, in Mosaic rings and a moustache. It is one of the mysterious trades of London, which support the foreigners of whom everybody asks "How do they manage to live?" The addition these scoundrels make to the mass of misery of the metropolis ought to draw the attention of the authorities upon them. But it is not so much the police as the Foreign Office that could apply the remedy. This importation of mendicants is a matter of international regulation; it should be stopped at the frontiers. We insist on no other rule with foreign nations than they would apply to us. An English boy, who should sling an organ over his shoulders and wander about Germany, would be arrested and sent out of the State. Even in Paris, the police permits no one to reside who has not a manifest means of living: the free importation of foreign paupers is not contemplated by any system of Tariff whatever, and those who make a trade of it ought to be pursued as common enemies. The duties of the Alien-office are not, we believe, very onerous at present; could it not be used as some barrier against this inundation? Our Foreign Minister could, surely, by his agents in the Courts of Savoy, Lucca, Bavaria, and other places from whence these victims come give warning to the respective Governments that, for such purposes, their juvenile subjects should not be allowed to land; we exclude no one who has a lawful occupation; but begging is not lawful, even in a native, and the music is only a cloak for mendicancy. The public might put a stop to the system, by merely ceasing to feed it; but of that there is no chance; their charity is as excessive as their musical tolerance; and so the evil continues.

It is singular that, with all the poverty of England and Ireland, the people never think of adopting such degrading trades; a tall, hulking Savoyard, with limbs and sinews fit for any amount of toil, prefers grinding a wretched organ month after month in the streets of London, despised and neglected, to engaging in a useful labour. Throughout the whole of the broad Continent it would be impossible to find an Englishman or an Irishman stooping to such a miserable expedient; yet the Irish peasant has as much musical taste, and sees more distress than the native of Savoy.

AMONG the many abuses which the Press exposes, from time to time, it has seldom brought to light anything more nefarious than the heartless practices of the sharpers who infest the minor courts of law and police in the Metropolis, and extort money from the unfortunate relatives of prisoners, under pretence either of acting as legal advocates themselves, or of obtaining the services of a lawyer, on behalf of parties charged with any crime. Some instances of this description of villany have recently been brought under the notice of the authorities in the respective courts where they occurred, and, though much indignation and desire to repress the evil were evinced, still, the feeling did not appear to be of that earnestness which would lead to the formation of any very sanguine hopes that the evil would be thoroughly eradicated. A poor creature, ignorant of the law, and of all that pertains to it, finds, for the first time in her life, a near relative, who, whatever his moral defects may be, is as dear to her as if his conduct were the most Phæsaical to correct, within the iron grasp of the law; in a country like England, she naturally expects that justice will be readily and cheaply obtained; she hastens to the court, and is there informed by one out or many shabby-genteel looking individuals, who loiter about, that he is a lawyer, and, for a given sum, will procure the acquittal of the relative.

The money, after pawning or selling every available article in her possession, is at last raised and paid over by the poor dupe to the vile scoundrel, who either turns out to be no lawyer at all, or else coolly tells her that the prisoner had better plead guilty, as he cannot do him any service; and these cruel impositions have been going on time out of mind, under the eyes and within the hearing of every one from the highest to the lowest connected with those courts, without the least notice having been taken of them. If the authorities in those places were actuated by a true spirit of humanity and love of justice, would this crying evil, we ask, have gone on so long unchecked as it has hitherto? It has at last become so glaring, that it has forced itself on their notice, and we trust the magistrates will compensate for past neglect in this respect, by the energy and zeal with which they will set about rooting out the abuse. With them alone the remedy rests, and it is with confidence we feel that they have determined to abate the nuisance, and those vermin—the soi-disant lawyers—will soon cease to infest their present haunts. The whole duty of a Judge to a prisoner is not comprised in presiding at his trial; he is bound, particularly in police courts, to extend protection to him, until he is found guilty.

A still more iniquitous abuse is that of the extortions practised by the officers of the prisons attached to those Courts, on unfortunate prisoners or their friends, when either desire an interview, or to communicate with each other by message. For every indulgence of this kind, ready money must be paid down, or a gratuity in the shape of gin, brandy, or some other liquor supplied. The suppression of this evil, at least, is most certainly completely within the power of the Magistrates, and nothing can be offered in extenuation of any neglect with respect to it on their part.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been chiefly remarkable for the high temperature of the air. The sky, with the exception of Monday, has been nearly always clouded or obscured by fogs; and the air, during the greater part of the week, was in gentle motion from the S.S.W. principally, and during the latter part was generally calm. The following are some particulars of each day:—

Thursday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and rain was falling till 9h. A.M.; the direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the average temperature of the day was 53°, being in excess above the ave ages for the season by about 5°. The average temperature for the week ending the 4th day was 49½°. Friday, the sky was mostly overcast till 7h. AM and again after 2h. P M., and the clouds were broken between these times; the directions of the wind were S S W. and W.S.W.; the average temperature for the day was 56°, being nearly 12° higher than it was on the Tuesday preceding, and nearly 9° above that for the season. Saturday, the sky was for the most part covered by clouds throughout the day; the direction of the wind for the former part of the day was W.N.W., and at the latter part it was S.S.W.; the average temperature for the day was 50°, being about 3° in excess above that for the season. Sunday, the sky was chiefly overcast throughout the day, and was clouded entirely at 9h. A.M., and mostly free from cloud after that time; the direction of the wind was W.S.W.; the day was beautiful; its average temperature was 55½°. Tuesday, the sky was believed to be free from cloud throughout the day, but a fog was prevalent, which, after 3h. P.M., became dense, and continued so till midnight; the air was in a calm state; the average temperature for the day was 54°. Wednesday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and there was a wasting fog all day; the air was calm; the average temperature for the day was 46½°, being 1° below that of Sunday. The air was saturated with moisture throughout this day. Thursday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, which was dull and very gloomy: the air was calm; the average temperature of the day was 46½°, and the average temperature for the week was 52½°

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

The weight of vapour in a cubic foot of air was four grains.

The degree of humidity was 87, where complete saturation would be represented by 100.

The weight of a cubic foot of air, under the average humidity, heat, and atmospheric pressure, was 527 grains.

The temperature for the month of October was unusually high, and exceeds that for the same month for several years past.

Alexander Ewing, Bishop Elect of Argyll and the Isles, were consecrated in St. Andrew's Church, Aberdeen. At the early hour the church was crowded, and many people had to go away from the door for want of room within the spacious building. Nearly all the Episcopal Clergy of Scotland were present on the occasion, robed in their canonicals, in front of the altar. Bishop Skinner, of Aberdeen, Primarius, assisted by Bishops Territ, of Edinburgh, and Russell, of Glasgow, conducted the more solemn and important part of the service, and the Rev. Charles Wordsworth, Warden of Trinity College, Glenalmond, preached the consecration sermon.

ON Wednesday, a notice was issued by his Grace the Archbishop of Canterbury, peremptorily requesting that the trustees of all churches and chapels do immediately give notice to all persons renting vaults under such churches and chapels to discontinue the sale of wines and spirits in such places, and also requesting that the vaults may not in future be let to any persons.

SANATORY REGULATION IN THE METROPOLIS.—On Wednesday, at the Court of Sewers, a special council a resolution carried, representing the inadequacy of the powers conferred on the City Commissioners of Sewers to carry into effect the requisite sanatory regulations in various localities, or to compel the owners of such places to drain their premises into the common sewers; and directing the City Remembrancer to prepare a notice of an application to Parliament in the next session, for an act to repeal the acts now in force, and to consolidate the powers of the commissioners present and future. Cellars are deemed desirable: the Commissioners are also empowered to prosecute the same, and to endeavour to obtain an Act of Parliament accordingly.

GREAT FOG.—On Tuesday evening, at an early hour, the metropolis was visited with one of the most dense fogs that has occurred for several years. At an early hour in the morning it hung heavily over the south and eastern portions of the metropolis, but at the morning it began to disperse, and the sun shone out brightly; but towards noon the fog again assumed a more heavy and dense appearance, particularly in the City, rendering it impracticable to carry on business without the aid of lights. The confusion increased, and before five o'clock to such a degree as to render the traffic not only to pedestrians, but to the multitude of omnibuses, cabs and vehicles of all descriptions that were going in every direction, of the most difficult and dangerous nature; all navigation by the various steamboats and other craft on the river being entirely suspended. The scene in many parts of the metropolis was of a most peculiar character, the dim shadows of vehicles and passengers flitting through the fog, aided by the lurid glare of the torches born by the numerous link men and boys, creating an effect sufficient to alarm the timid. In the neighbourhood of the Elephant and Castle, and other places where coaches and omnibuses are in the habit of stopping, men with links were stationed at short distances from each other. About nine o'clock, however, a slight variation took place, the atmosphere being much lighter; but this was only partially so, as in many places towards the S. and S. W. it continued as dense as ever. Some fatal accidents occurred during the prevalence of the fog. On the river a steamboat got ashore opposite the Penitentiary, and near Blackfriars-bridge a lighterman, who was unable to distinguish the water, stepped into it instead of on a barge, and was drowned. On Wednesday, several barges which ought not to have ascended the river, got ashore on the Middlesex shore. One had found its way up to Battersea instead of Blackfriars-bridge. In Upper Grosvenor-street, the house No. 96, which was furnished but not occupied, was robbed of a large quantity of furniture. The property was subsequently found in Bell-lane, Spitalfields.

COUNT BOMPIN.—This nobleman has caused to be published in the journals, in consequence of inability to discharge his debts, a grateful acknowledgment of the services rendered to him by the British Government, and several members of both Houses of Parliament, in securing his speedy restoration to his lady's property from the Court of Session, in 1844. The return is to specify the various termini, lines partially or entirely contracted for, and the amounts to be expended. Under the heads of "Contracts entered into," the date of the execution of the contract is to be given, the amount remaining to be expended under it; the estimated amount to be expended under each contract to the 30th of June, 1848; the amount in addition to such contracts; the amount required to complete the works, and up to the 30th of June next. It will also comprise a list of lines for which no contracts have been made; of the works commenced, and the amount required to complete them to the 30th of June; of those not commenced, and the amount authorised to be raised and expended, with the probable expenditure during the half-year ending the 31st of December, 1847, the 30th of June, 1848, and the 31st of December, 1848. It is optional with the companies to comply with the requirements of the return or not, as the Commissioners have no power to compel them; but it is thought that, as the information sought for is not inquisitorial in its character, the return will be generally acquiesced in.

POSTSCRIPT.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office yesterday (Friday), at one o'clock. Lord John Russell, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir George Grey, and most of the other Ministers, were present. Previous to the Council several of the Cabinet Ministers had interviews with Lord John Russell at his Lordship's official residence in Downing-street.

THE GOVERNOR-GENERAL OF INDIA.—The Thursday last a Court of Directors was held at the East India House, when the Right Hon. the Earl of Dalhousie was sworn in as Governor-General of India. His Lordship afterwards dined with the Directors at the London Tavern, Bishopsgate-street, when they were honoured with the company of her Majesty's Ministers and many other distinguished personages. The newly-appointed Governor-General, with the Countess and family, is expected to leave town this day (Saturday) for Portsmouth, to embark for Alexandria, en route for Calcutta; Lieut.-Colonel A. Mountain, C.B., Military Secretary to his Lordship, and Lieutenant the Hon. F. H. Fane, Aide-de-Camp, accompanying his Excellency.

LORD BROUGHAM has arrived at his estate near Cannes, where his Lordship intends to remain until the Meeting of Parliament.

VISCOUNT ENFIELD has retired from the Secretaryship of the Board of Control. His Lordship is succeeded by George Cornewall Lewis, Esq., M.P. for Herefordshire.

PRESENT TO THE HOUSE OF COMMONS.—A package, containing books, being a present from the French Government to the House of Commons, has arrived at the Custom-house by a steamer from Boulogne. The information was addressed to the Speaker of the House of Commons. The Commissioners of Customs have given the necessary directions for the delivery of the books duty free.

A TESTIMONIAL, consisting of a carved oak cabinet containing 500 sovereigns, accompanied by a suitable address, was presented to Mr. Roebuck by the learned gentleman's admirers at Bath on Thursday last.

THE BRITISH HALL.—At a numerous meeting held on Thursday at Guildhall, of the committee appointed to conduct the arrangements for the Polish Ball on the 17th inst., Mr. George Silcon in the chair, it was announced that Miss Dolby, Miss Poole, Miss Rainforth, Miss Reeds, the Misses Williams, Mr. W. Harrison, Signor Brizza, Signor Burdini, Mr. James Bennett, Mr. Bodda, and Mr. John Parry have generously offered their gratuitous services. It was also stated that in consequence of the ball taking place on the eve of the meeting of Parliament, an unusually large number of aristocratic and fashionable visitors are expected to be present.

THURSDAY afternoon, the deputation appointed at the meeting recently held at Birmingham, in reference to the financial and commercial condition of the country, had an interview with Lord John Russell. A somewhat lengthened discussion ensued, in the course of which Mr. Spooner, Mr. Scholefield, and others, urged their respective opinions. Lord John Russell rising to close the interview, Mr. Salt expressly asked his Lordship whether he was prepared to grant present or giant relief, and a full inquiry into the effects of the existing monetary legislation. His Lordship, after a deliberation of a few seconds, replied, "I do not say that I will or I will not." The deputation then retired.

THE ROMAN CATHOLIC HIERARCHY IN ENGLAND.—Dr. Walsh, the senior Roman Catholic Bishop in England, has declined the proffered dignity of Archbishop of London or Westminster, on the ground of age and infirmities. The documents which were in preparation at Rome for authorising the elevation of Dr Walsh to the Archiepiscopic will accordingly have to be changed should the Holy See accept his refusal. The change will necessarily affect the appointment to the Bishopric of Birmingham, which Dr. Walsh declines to vacate. There will be but one Archbishopric founded at present; and Dr. Briggs, the next senior to Dr. Walsh, will probably be nominated Bishop of Leeds. It is the intention of the see of Rome only to fix the new sees according to population.

NEW IRISH STIPENDIARY MAGISTRATE.—Mr. J. H. Shell, a magistrate of Westmeath, has been appointed a stipendiary magistrate in the room of the late Major Shaw, son of Sir Robert Shaw, Bart.

Peake, a little piece from his pen—the last which he ever wrote—is shortly to be produced at the Adelphi, with the whole strength of the company; the principal performers consenting to take subordinate parts. The title of the piece is "Gabrielle; or, a Lady and in Ireland."

EXTENSIVE FORGERY.—On Thursday, information was received at the Mansion-House that an eminent banking-house in Lombard-street had been defrauded of £1800, by means of a forgery. The parties, it is supposed, to lull suspicion, obtained the money in notes to a large amount, one being for £1000, No 8 dated 1st January, 1847. The Foresters have obtained a clue to the guilty parties.

ASSASSINATION IN IRELAND.—Twenty minutes past six o'clock on Tuesday evening, as Major Mahon, of Strokestown, in the county of Roscommon, was returning to his residence, after attendance at a meeting of the Roscommon Board of Law Guardians, he was shot dead by an unseen hand when about four miles from home. Major Mahon has been in possession of the Hartland property for a couple of years. The tenants owed three years' rent, amounting to £30,000.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SWITZERLAND.

A letter, dated Bale, 31st inst., announces that the Austrian Ambassador has reached Zurich, and has established himself at the Kirch, in the Voraiberg. The Prussian Minister is about to fix his residence at Neufchatel during the civil war. Colonel Luvini, of the Canton of Tessino, has been commissioned to organise the army, to be independent of the grand federal army, and of which he is to have the command-in-chief. The object of this corps is to be composed exclusively of Italian Swiss, to be specially charged with the guard of the barriers on the side of Lombardy and Piedmont, and to interrupt all communication between Italy and the Cantons of the Sonderbund. This corps is to be composed of 4000 men, and to be formed at Bellinzona, existing hermetically the passage of Mont. St. Bernard. A fresh Radical conspiracy has been discovered at Fribourg. M. Remy, former Chancellor of State, one of the conspirators most seriously compromised, has been arrested, and his papers have been seized at his house.

From a rather strong article in the Journal des Débats of Thursday against the Federal Government of Switzerland, it is clear that the French Cabinet intends to intervene by force of arms in the affairs of that country. It was even currently reported in Paris on Thursday evening, that, at the Cabinet Council held the day before, at which the King is stated, a decision of this kind had been come to. The direct interference, however, on the part of the Government of Louis Philippe is not very probable; though there can be no doubt that indirectly his Majesty will do all in his power to aid the cause of the Sonderbund.

FRANCE.

At Paris, on Saturday last, a cause had tried at the Court of Assizes of the Seine, for criminal assaults perpetrated on two young girls, when in a state of somnolency produced by the inhalation of ether, which he had administered to them under pretence of preventing pain from the extraction of teeth. He was found guilty, and sentenced to six years' hard labour at the hulks, and pay 1000 francs damages to one of the girls, who was under age.

M. Parmentier, whose conduct in the affair of General Cubières and M. Teste before the Court of Peers it is not necessary to designate, died a few days ago, at Lure, of grief.

SPAIN.

Letters from Santiago of Cbili announce that the Spanish General Maroto has died in that city. The General's name is well known in connection with the Bergara Treaty; he was also ex-Minister of the Spanish Council of War and Marine, at Madrid

The Marquis de Miraflores, who has been just nominated Governor of the Palace, has written a work that is about to be published simultaneously in Madrid and London, entitled, "An Impartial Judgment on the Question of Succession to the Crown of Spain, raised between England and France, in consequence of the Marriage of the Most Serene Infanta of Spain, Donna Maria Luisa Fernanda, with the Most Serene Duke de Montpensier."

PORTUGAL.

The French and Spanish Ministers at the Court of Lisbon have tendered their resignations, in consequence of their unwillingness to fulfil the new instructions from their respective Governments, the purport of which is, that they should look upon the protocol as no longer existing, and aid the Cabralists in furtherance of their designs.

Ibrahim Pacha left Malta on the 26th ult., in the French steam-frigate Descartes, for Naples. He was saluted on embarking by Fort St. Angelo and all the squadron. It is said he intends to reside at Lucca, for the benefit of the baths.

ITALY.

The French are making a demonstration upon the coast of Italy. On the 25th ult. they despatched a squadron in the Gulf of Spezzia to five ships of the line and three steam frigates.

The Nouvelliste of Marseilles states, from Rome, that the Pope has suspended the Bishop of Parma for having taken part in the Austrian intrigues against the Pontifical Government.

The people of Fivizzano, on learning lately that the Duke of Modena's troops were marching to take their town, sounded the tocsin and rose en masse to repel them. The alarm, however, proved unfounded; but the determination of the people on the occasion caused the Duke to send the troops intended for Fivizzano to another destination

The departure for Parma of the Empress Maria Louisa, which had been fixed for the 5th of November, is indefinitely postponed. People are tempted to connect this postponement with a project of abdication in favour of the Duke of Lucca, to whom, as is known, the Duchy of Parma is to revert on the death of the present Sovereign

The King of Sardinia has issued a decree modifying the existing laws, and granting concessions to the public press. On the whole, the decree is of a Liberal character. The excitement against the ex-Duke of Lucca continues. In a recent journey he was stopped by the peasantry, and compelled, in spite of his escort, to cry "Long live Pius IX. and Italian liberty."

HAMPTON COURT.

Hampton Court.—By permission of the officers, the splendid band of the Royal Lancers plays in the Palace Gardens, on Mondays and Fridays, from three to five P.M., when many of the families of rank in this part of the country attend. In summer the band hours are from six to eight, P.M.

THE ROYAL UNIFORM.—It is reported that the following dress regulations will shortly be issued:—Full-dress uniform, no change; undress uniform, also unchanged, but never to be worn without cocked hat and sword. For all ranks there will be a surtout coat, single-breasted; buttons arranged to correspond with full and undress uniform, and to be thus distinguished.—Flag-officers, four rows of narrow gold lace on each cuff; captains, three rows of lace; commanders, two; and lieutenants, one; mates, a gold cord, instead of lace; officers of the civil branch to wear no distinguishing lace.

IN consequence of the order issued by the Government to the Bank of England, on Monday last, the Bank of Ireland on Tuesday advanced their rate of discount to 5 per cent. They have adopted this step purely as one of precaution, as they have not been required by Government to extend their discounts

REGISTRY OF DEEDS.—A communication from Mr. Trevelyan to Mr. Pierce Mahony, the eminent solicitor, intimates that the Irish Registry Bill will be immediately directed by the Treasury to take measures for regularly placing upon record copies of all searches made in the Registry-office, so that they may be available for the purpose of future inquiries, and also to make arrangements for recording the satisfaction of judgments in the Judgment-office.

THE funeral of the late lamented Professor M'Cul agh took place on the 30th, and was conducted according to the order prescribed in a notice which was yesterday posted in the College Courts. The Fellows, Professors, and scholars formed their procession in the College Courts at half-past seven o'clock. The members of the Royal Irish Academy, four by four; the scholars, Fellows, and Professors, in the same order; next, the Provost, the Bedell with the mace, the remains, chief mourners, the friends of the deceased, three by three. The procession being formed in the order of the programme, moved from the hall to Professor's building, round the Library-square, and thence into the Chapel, where the greater part of the burial service was read by Mr. Junior Dean. The procession then accompanied the remains in the same order through the Library to the top of Cavendish-row, where it separated. The members of the College wore their academic costume, the Fellows, Professors, and Masters wearing scarves and bands. The procession extended nearly the entire length of Sackville-street.

NATIONAL COUNCIL.—On Tuesday last the proposed meeting of Irish Representatives, &c., under the title of "Council of National Distress and National Safety," was held at the Rotunda, Dublin. The object was to consider of the best remedial measures to be taken to relieve the prevailing distress, particularly during the ensuing winter. A resolution having been carried to the effect that the Committee, composed of all the members assembled, should then retire, for the purpose of deliberating upon the several subjects that claimed their attention, and of considering the different plans or propositions that it might be thought necessary to bring forward, in order that on a future day they might be submitted to the public consideration, the meeting separated.

THE Boards of Guardians throughout the country have been taken wholly by surprise by an act of the Relief Commissioners. A general order has been issued to the Bank of Ireland and its branches, authorising them to impound all moneys lodged to the credit of the Guardians for the repayment of advances under the Temporary Relief Act. In Cork, the order has caught some £3000, and in the neighbouring union of Bandon, £3500 has been attached.

AT the last Assizes for Dublin Union, which comprises the most fertile portion of Meath, the Archdeacon of Meath, the Rev. Lists of labourers having been made, the apportionment was in the ratio of six men for every hundred acres. The resolution undertaking to employ such proportion has been very numerously signed by proprietors and occupiers.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—Rent announced for the week, £37.

MURDER IN CLARE.—The Limerick Chronicle contains the following, communicated by a magistrate of the county of Clare:—"Scarriff, Oct. 30.—Another of those horrible murders which disgrace our unfortunate country has just been committed on the high road leading from Killaloe and Scariff to Tulla and Ennis, in this county. The unfortunate victim was Richard Walsh, steward and caretaker to C. G. O'Callaghar, Esq., of Ballynahinch, who, when on his way to Ennistymon morning, at eight o'clock, near Fort Ann, was fired at from behind a wall, and shot dead. One ball entered his mouth, carrying away the roof of the skull; the second also entered the head. Both shots were heard by persons immediately near, but no clue has been obtained of the perpetrators."

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

THE HIGHWAY ROBBERY AND MURDER IN WESTMINSTER.—On Monday, Mr. Bedford resided, at the Grosvenor Arms, the inquest touching the death of Mr Bellchambers, who was robbed and brutally ill-used, from the effects of which his death has arisen, on the night of the 11th ult. Inspector Taylor, B, stated that the case was still in the hands of the police. He was sanguine, he said, he should be able to bring the offenders to justice. The inquiry was then adjourned for a week. This was done accordingly.

RAILWAY CASUALTIES.—A DESPERATE ENCOUNTER.—An accident occurred at the Masborough Station, Midland Railway, on Friday evening (se'nnight). Two goods trains (the 9h. 30m. A.M., and 10h. 15m., A.M.), from Derby, were detained at the station to make way for a quick passenger train from Derby, due at the 10h. 15m., A.M., train having been instructed not to start from the siding until the passenger and the 9h. 30m. trains had passed on. He neglected this injunction, however, and left after the passenger train, when the 9h. 30m. train had proceeded. The result was that the latter, consisting of thirty loaded waggons, ran into his train, at an angle of 45 degrees, with fearful violence. The conductors of the respective trains, in their alarm, jumped off the engines, and the engine of the 10h. 15m., A.M., train, which, with one carriage attached, had been cut off from the rest by the force of the shock, started off, with fearful rapidity, along the line, passing the Swinton Station, at the Intermill, on its arrival at the Darfield Station, one of the officers boldly leaped upon it, and succeeded in stopping its headlong career. In the meantime the 10h. 15m. train, also setting off, drove out of way the seven attached waggons of the other fugitive, but was, fortunately, arrested at the Swinton Station. There were no personal injuries sustained, but the damage done to the carriages and to the detached engines is extensive. The conductors were sent in custody to Derby, to await the decision of the Board of Directors.

THE LATE MURDERS IN BIRMINGHAM.—The JURY, on Friday night, about half-past nine o'clock, returned a verdict fou de se against Ann Wilkes, the murderess of the four murdered children. The murderess was on Saturday (30th), at nine o'clock, interred in St. Paul's Chapel-yard without the usual burial service. So secretly was the affair managed by the police, that not more than a very few persons were present at this, the termination of a sad and afflicting tragedy

MANCHESTER, SHEFFIELD, AND LINCOLNSHIRE RAILWAY.—On the afternoon of Thursday se'nnight, an accident occurred in a luggage train of some thirty waggons in length, proceeding from Sheffield to Manchester. The seventh waggon was loaded with iron pipes or castings, and one of them having fallen upon the line, as the succeeding waggons were thrown off, and as the train was proceeding at full speed, they were all smashed to pieces by the force of the concussion. There were no persons injured.

ALARMING ACCIDENT IN THE ROYAL ARSENAL, WOOLWICH.—Between twelve and one at noon, on Tuesday last, two accidents of very alarming character took place at the Royal Arsenal, in connection with the performance of gun experiments to test the relative strength of the ordnance supplied by the various foundries, amongst which are the Low Moor and Carron Iron Works, and a gun invented by Mr. Phillips, composed of toughened iron, and said to be equal in strength to the light pieces cast from gun-metal. The guns are proved, and each has assembled for dinner on board the Justitia convict hulk, one of these guns is mounted, at Tiptree, near Kelvington, in Essex, we were induced this week to avail ourselves of an invitation to inspect the grounds and stock there, and we found a large farm and some promising crops well-cultivated expression, it does not pay; instead of a benefit, it is an injury to the party most interested, and to the community at large. We were sorry to see that Mr. Mechi's improvements were of this description. We question if he will obtain 2s. per cent. for the money which he has thus expended. The turnips, certainly, were very fine, but is Mr. Mechi content that the profits on the crop would buy a leg of mutton? The stock of cattle and sheep was insignificant as to numbers, and inferior in condition. We would suggest the application of the "Spirit of improvement" to the premises on the farm, which are both inconvenient and unhealthy, both for farmer and cattle. The only real improvement we noticed at Tiptree was that of drainage, which, by-the-by, seems the only genuine one amidst the many counterfeits which pretend to that name. This was of "Agricultural improvement." The farmer must guard against expending 2s. 6d. to obtain 2s. worth of produce.

SINGULAR DISCOVERY.—On July, 1840, Mr. John Bibby, a merchant of the utmost respectability in Liverpool, and the founder of the Irish Bank, was found dead in a pit in a remote field near Aintree, six miles from Liverpool, and three from Mr. Bibby's residence at Bootle. On the previous day a friend that he had been waylaid and thrown into the pit; and in this opinion they were confirmed by the discovery that his watch was missing. Search was made for it, and the pit emptied in vain, the watch could not be found. Last Wednesday, however, new light was thrown on the transaction. A stranger took a watch to Russells, the well-known watchmakers in Liverpool, to have repaired. On looking at it they discovered that the original number had been defaced, and another substituted. On further examination they found their own private mark, placed on the watch when they had repaired it for the late Mr. Bibby. On Saturday the stranger called for it, and, when questioned, the watch was traced to a disreputable character, the keeper of a disorderly house. Two men are in custody, and the police are making further inquiry.

ON THE WEATHER, DURING THE QUARTER ENDING SEPTEMBER 30, 1847.

THE Quarterly Report of the Registrar-General contains the results of Meteorological Observations taken at twenty-six different places in England, during the past quarter; all these observations have been systematically examined, reduced, and discussed, by Mr. Glaisher; the hygrometrical results being deduced from the observations of the dry and wet-bulb thermometers by his own hygrometrical tables.

In his remarks upon the weather, he says, the depression of temperature below the average which took place from the 7th of June to the end of the month, continued till July 4. On July 5, a period of hot weather set in; and, from this time to the end of the month, the average daily temperature was, with very slight exceptions, above that of the season; the period between the 11th and the 16th was the hottest during the year. The daily temperatures during the first and last weeks in August were at or below the average; and they were above the average during the remainder of the month. The month of September was cold; the temperature was, nearly every day throughout the month, below that of the season.

The average temperature of July at Greenwich was 65° 4, which is 0°·9 above that of 1846; 5°·6 above that of 1845; 4°·0 above that of 1844; 4°·5 above that of 1843; 5°·3 above that of 1842; and 7°·6 above that of 1841. The temperature of this month, this year, was, therefore, very remarkable

The average temperature for August, at Greenwich was 62°·1, which is 1°·1 above that of the average for the six preceding years

The average temperature of September at Greenwich was 52°·3, which is 3°·1 below that of the average for the six preceding years. The low temperature for this month is very remarkable, and we believe the temperature was lower this month than it has been in September for a great many years.

The average temperature for the quarter at Greenwich was 60°·6, which is 1°·4 above that for the average for the six preceding years.

The whole of the hygrometrical results are as nearly as possible the same as the average for the six preceding years; these are given in detail in the report. The pressure of the atmosphere was greater than that in the corresponding quarter for the preceding six years; and, as the pressure from the weight of water was the same as that for the average for these years, it would seem that the excess of air was actually larger than in any of these years.

The amount of rain fallen at Greenwich within the quarter was 4.7 inches in depth; this quantity is about the half of the usual fall.

The horizontal movement of the air was about 340 miles weekly.

In July, the reading of the thermometer on vegetation was below 40°, on five nights; the lowest reading was 36°; in August, also, it was five nights below 40°; the lowest reading was 39°; and in September it was below 40° on seventeen nights, on ten of which it was below 39°; the lowest reading was 24°

Mr. Glaisher remarks that the hot weather in July was general between the latitudes of 51° and 59°, except within a few miles of the southern coast. It does not seem to have extended beyond 59°. The most intense heat seems to have been at the inland parts of Sussex. This period of hot weather seems to have been very much modified in the counties of Cornwall and Devon, at Brighton, Liverpool, Whitehaven; in fact, at all places in the vicinity of the sea. The monthly even temperature at all places situate at some distance from the sea, south of Durham, and at a moderate elevation above the sea, are nearly the same as those at Greenwich, except those in the counties of Cornwall and Devon. In our papers of May 15, and August 7, the excess and defect of temperature, in Cornwall and Devonshire, above or below that of other places, are spoken of. In the past quarter it seems that in July the mean temperature was below, in August it was about the same, and, in September, it was above that of other places. The climate of those counties, however, differs much in different places from each other, but every part of them seems to be free from great extremes and great changes.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

COLONEL HANMER WARRINGTON, K.H.

THIS gentleman, late her Majesty's Agent and Consul General at Tripoli, died at Patras on the 18th ult. His distinguished career in the service of his country extended over a period of full fifty years. In 1795 he received a Cornet's commission in the 1st Dragoon Guards, and accompanied the regiment to Flanders. His afterwards purchased a troop in the 2nd Dragoon Guards, and was thence promoted to the Majority of the 4th Dragoon Guards. Subsequently he obtained the appointment of Inspecting Field Officer to the Carnarvonshire District; and twelve years, not long after, by the Duke of York, to assist in organising the Spanish cavalry under General Balesteros, and in generally aiding the Spanish troops opposed to the French. About the year 1812, Colonel Warrington was selected to represent his Sovereign at Tripoli, as Agent and Consul General; and this important post he continued to occupy for the twenty-four years, during which period no Consul in any part of the world ever carried the name and influence of Great Britain higher than the lamented gentleman whose death we now record. He was honoured with the Guelphic Order by the King of Hanover, and with that of St. Guiseppe by the Grand Duke of Tuscany.

Colonel Warrington was born in 1776, the third son of the Rev. George Warrington, rector of Pleasley, County Derby, by Mary, his wife, daughter and heir of Henry Strudwyck, Esq. He married, in 1795, Jane Elizabeth, only daughter of Charles Price, Esq., and has left a large family. His eldest brother, George Henry Warrington, Esq., of Pentrepant, married Mary, eldest daughter and heir of Charles Carew, Esq., of Carew Castle, County Pembroke, and Crowcombe, County Somerset, and assumed, in consequence, the name of the ancient family of Carew.

THE LADY FRANCES COLE

HER Ladyship, whose death occurred on the 1st inst., at her residence, in Lowndes-square, was relict of the late eminently distinguished officer, Sir Galbraith Lowry Cole, and second daughter of James, 1st Earl of Malmesbury, the celebrated diplomatist of the reign of George III. Lady Frances was born 22d of August, 1784, and married 15th June, 1815. She leaves three sons (the eldest, Arthur Lowry Cole, a Captain in the 69th), and four daughters.

COUNT HUGH FERDINAND MENSDORFF.

THE Count has just been placed in mourning by the death, at Gödlsenberg, of Count Hugh Mansdorff, the Queen's cousin. He was a Bohemian Noble, the eldest son of Emanuel Count Von Mensdorff, G.C.B., by the Princess Sophia Frederica Caroline Louisa of Saxe-Coburg, eldest sister of H.R.H. the Duchess of Kent. Count Hugh had only just completed his 41st year. He held military rank under the Emperor of Austria; and, at the period of his decease, was Colonel Commandant of a Regiment of Cuirassiers. He leaves three brothers, Alphonso Frederick, Major in the Austrian service, Alexander-Constantine-Albert, and Arthur Augustus, both Captains of Hussars in the same army.

THE RIGHT REV. WILLIAM RIDDELL, ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOP OF THE NORTHERN DISTRICT.

DR. RIDDELL is one more addition to the ever-glorious list of pious and devoted priests whose lives have been sacrificed in the performance of the sacred duty of attending and solacing the poor in the hour of suffering and sickness. His Lordship died on the 2nd inst., of typhus fever, which he had caught in his parochial visitations among the poor of his community.

Dr Riddell was third son of the late Ralph Riddell, Esq., of Felton and Hebburn, in Northumberland, by Elizabeth, his wife, eldest daughter of Joseph Ilbert, Esq., and grandson of Thomas Riddell, Esq., of Swinburne Castle, who was engaged with his father in the affair of 1715, and was attainted in consequence, which, being afterwards reversed by treason, he pleaded guilty, and underwent the penalty. The family of Riddell is one of high standing and large estate in Northumberland.—Of Norman origin, and the name of its patriarch appears on the Roll of Battle Abbey

JAMES M'CULLAGH, LL.D.

THE melancholy death of this learned and distinguished professor, who perished by his own hand, at his rooms, in Dublin College, on the 23rd ult., has cast a deep gloom over the literary and scientific circles in which he moved. Dr. M'Cullagh, who was only forty years of age at the period of his decease, was formerly Mathematical Professor in the University of Dublin, and succeeded, in 1843, on the elevation of Dr. Lloyd to the Provostship, to the Chair of Natural Philosophy. It would appear from the evidence at the inquest that his reason had been unsettled by intense application to some intricate problem, unaccompanied by that due regard to the regulating of his health, rendered imperative by his sedentary habits and mental labours.

THE OPPRESSIVE ADVERTISEMENT DUTY.—A person may advertise in omnibuses, cover the walls with placards, occupy the streets with vans, and, in fact, use every means which his ingenuity can devise for the purpose of making known his wares, and pay no duty; but if he puts a line in a newspaper, already doubly taxed, he immediately pays the Government 1s. 6d. If a poor girl wants a situation, at a time when every farthing is of vital importance to her, she pays the same amount of duty as a nobleman would do for advertising an estate of the value of £100,000.

MILDNESS OF THE SEASON.—A superb display of Chrysanthemums was to be seen, a day or two since, in the garden of the Middle Temple.

THE INSURRECTION IN SWITZERLAND.

PANORAMA OF FRIBOURG, SHOWING THE POSITION OF THE JESUITS' COLLEGE AND THE TOWN DEFENCES.

WE quote the following very interesting letter on the affairs of Switzerland from the Daily News: and have specially to thank the writer for his obliging transmission of the originals of the two accompanying Illustrations.—ED. I. L. N.]

FRIBOURG, Oct. 27.

I arrived here yesterday from Berne. The frontier was occupied on each side of the ravine by a corps of cavalry. The entrances to the town are in the course of being strengthened by strong timber stockades; and I am given to understand that the ground has been undermined in every direction, and powder traps skilfully laid for an approaching invader. A large portion of pine forest has been felled, because it interfered with the play of a battery on the high road, and to cross the famous suspension bridge, (the longest in Europe, except the Menai,) is, of course, a military impossibility: one side of Fribourg forming an inaccessible cliff, is further defended by a range of public conveniences which I shall not particularly specify. The feeble point is the upper town, giving outlet into the country, and on that side rises, o'ertopping the tower of the Cathedral, the Jesuits' College, an immense and conspicuous structure. I send you a panorama of Fribourg, in which you will at a glance see the relative position of this building and the town defences; you will oblige the public by sending it to your pictorial contemporary, the ILLUSTRATED NEWS, who will place the sense both under the general eye. On the terrace which forms the students' play-ground, they have just planted three large mortars, capacious of shells of 12-inch diameter, and they practice daily in projectile science, showing the boys the mysteries of the parabola. Four hundred soldiers are quartered in the College.

If this building is bombarded and fired by the troops of the Diet, (which is probable enough,) the Jesuits will not be the losers. They did not build at all, and are only lodgers paying rent to a joint-stock company, who twenty years ago, spent their capital in their structure, not knowing whether to rent it as a barrack or as an hospital to the town.

Faber inceitus scamnum facere no.

Some of the speculators originated the idea of letting it to the children of Loyola, and much benefit has accrued to the Canton from the expenditure of about £8000 a year, which the 200 scholars gathered under their auspices, have brought to the spot. It has been a capital milk-cow for Fribourg, and they are right to give battle for its maintenance.

The town is bristling with bayonets; every soldier wears a little pewter medal, which talisman he is taught will render him invulnerable in the coming leaden hail-storm.

There is a proclamation on the walls this morning addressed to the refractory district of Morat, the Ulster of Fribourg, and which refuses to join the rest of the Canton in its rebellion against the Imperial Diet; this address urges on them the fact of their enjoying freedom of Protestant worship under the rule of Catholics, and, therefore, "they ought to help Catholics to similar freedom, in retaining the men of their choice to educate their children."

* * * * * * *

Accounts from the southern frontier (Vaud) bring news of a general uprise of the population in arms. At Vernig, and round the Castle of Chillon, reviews of armed men are taking place amid great enthusiasm. The reason for this intensity of feeling at that particular point is the expected attempt of the Valais peasantry to break the barrier and join the Fribourgers. The huge rock which divides Upper from Lower Valais, and does duty for a capital to both, is rather ambitiously styled Zion, and has been for ages the receptacle of retrograde notions and stagnant opinions. It has long been a militaire round the neck of the Confederacy, and will so continue until the Valaisians receive a sound drubbing from their more civilised neighbours.

* * * * * * *

On returning to the hotel, I found at the head of the table d'hote General Mallatrdez, Commander-in-Chief of Fribourg, with his Adjutant (an odd mess-table for the staff; but men are in a state of primitive simplicity here). The General is a fine old veteran, and commanded the Swiss Guard in the streets of Paris when the people demolished Charles X. and his dynasty His conversation was that of an old sportsman. There are about twenty officers of the body-guard of Charles X. in the service of this Canton. Count O'Mahoney and Marquis de Nicolai have fixed their tent here.

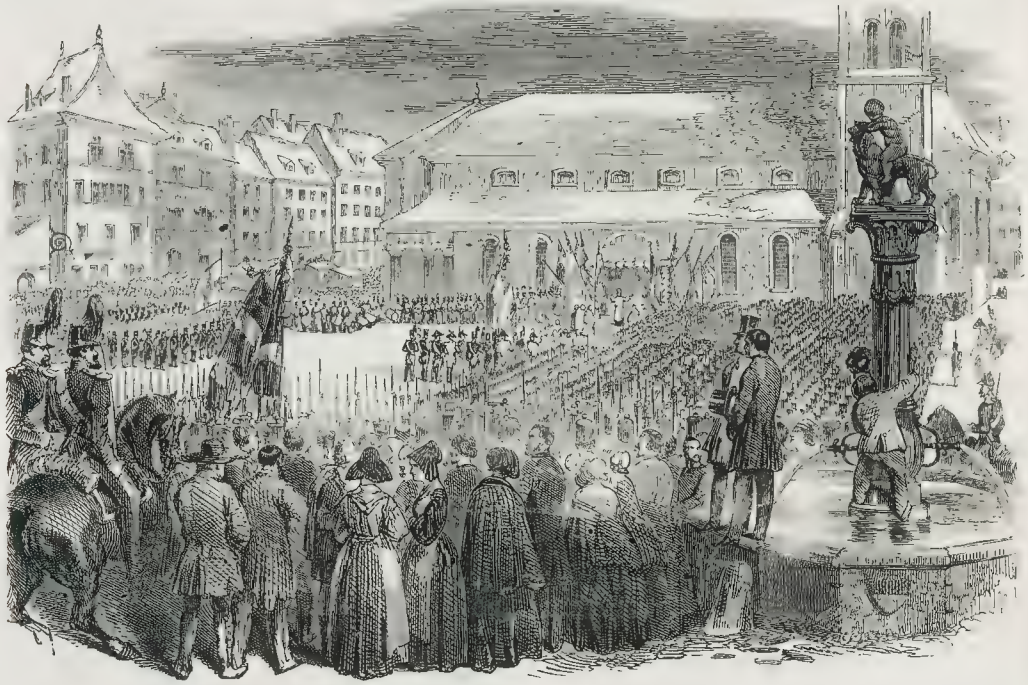
At Lausanne a decree has just been published, prohibiting any man who carries arms for his country from being arrested from debt, a privilege which many Repeal members from Ireland now enjoy.

Young Peel was put into the watch-house a few nights back, for not answering at the Morat-gate of Berne the qui vive of the sentinel. He made a great fuss about it to the Diet; but Lieut. Funk was charged with a formal apology to the Diplomate, and the affair has dropped.

The post is stopped in the Valais; the vaudois coaches are supposed to carry the infection of Liberalism, and the passengers are transhipped into Valaisian vehicles—not an improved method of conveyance.

BERNE, Oct. 28.

I returned here this morning from Fribourg. The road was strongly garrisoned on both sides of the frontier. I intended to have furnished you with a second communication from the seat of the Diet, but I have been led to understand that the communication with Lucerne will be interrupted to-morrow, so I depart this evening for the head-quarters of the rebels I remarked here several parish priests (pasteurs), wearing a red bandage round their left arm, with a white cross embroidered thereon On inquiry, I learn that they have devoted themselves in their spiritual capacity to attendance on the Federal troops. All is activity here in the war department.



GRAND MILITARY MASS BEFORE THE TROOPS OF THE SONDERBUND.

WOMBWELL'S MENAGERIE IN THE GREAT QUADRANGLE, WINDSOR CASTLE.

WOMBWELL'S MENAGERIE AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

THE Windsor Michaelmas Fair, which was held on Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday, last week, had, for its greatest attraction, Wombwell's Menagerie, the largest and best exhibition of the kind since Cross's celebrated collection at Exeter Change. The entry of the long train of caravans into the town, on the previous Saturday, was a striking affair; and its location in the space of ground, at the corner of Sheet-street and High-street, by permission of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, was a fortunate circumstance for the proprietor of the collection. An act of liberal consideration, on the part of Mr. and Mrs. Edmonds, the managers, merits mention: on the first day, the whole of the children and their teachers, of the different charity schools in Windsor and Eton, numbering about 700, were admitted gratuitously.

On the morning of the second day of the fair, previous to the exhibition being opened to the public in general, the Hon. Colonel Phipps, his Royal Highness Prince Albert's private secretary, went to visit the collection, accompanied by his family, and expressed great pleasure at the show and the performance, a visit which, no doubt, led to the subsequent exhibition before her Majesty, the Prince Consort, and the Court, in the Quadrangle of the Castle, which we have illustrated. In the afternoon of the third day of the fair (Wednesday), her Majesty and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, on leaving the Castle for their afternoon's drive, proceeded through the Royal Mews into the High-street, doubtless with the intention of obtaining a glimpse of Wombwell's façade, and then proceeded through the street and down Thames-street, in continuation of their drive.

In the course of Wednesday, Mr. Edmonds received the Royal command to have the whole of the exhibition placed in the Great Quadrangle of the Castle, at two o'clock on Thursday, in a manner similar to that in which it was stationed in the fair.

Upon the receipt of this gratifying command, the servants of the Menagerie set about washing and cleaning the animals, and their dens and cages, so as to introduce the collection to Royalty in as presentable a manner as the short interval would allow.

On Thursday morning, at about ten o'clock, the caravans commenced their march from Sheet-street, and attracted a large degree of notice as they drew up to the Quadrangle, in the centre of which they were arranged. The elephants' carriage, or castle, drawn by six greys and four bays, driven by Mr. Bostock, was the first to enter the Quadrangle; then followed the carriage of the rhinoceros, drawn by four greys and four bays; next, the whole train of the Menagerie. By the time appointed, all was in readiness, a boarded floor was laid down, and covered with cloth. At three o'clock, her Majesty the Queen, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses Prince Albert, the Duchess of Kent, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, his Excellency the Belgian Minister, the Marquis and Marchioness of Lansdowne, &c., left the Castle by the Queen's Entrance, and, on arriving at the exhibition, were received by Mr Wombwell (who had left Warwick expressly to be present) and Mr Edmonds, by whom they were conducted throughout the exhibition. There were also present in the suite of her Majesty, the Countess of Desart, Lady Caroline Cocks, Baroness de Speth, Lady Anna Maria Dawson, Miss L. Dawson Damer, the Earl of Morley, the Hon. Colonel Phipps, Mr. R. Ormsby Gore, Colonel Seymour, Mr. G. E. and the Hon. Mrs. Anson, the Dowager Lady Lyttelton, Major-General Bowles, Colonel SirGeorgeand Lady Couper, &c.

The Queen walked twice around the Exhibition, entering into familiar conversation, with reference to the animals and birds, with the proprietor and Mr Edmonds. The attention of her Majesty, and especially that of the Royal children, was peculiarly attracted by a couple of lion-tiger cubs, a cross-breed between the royal Bengal tiger and a noble Caffrarian lioness, which were whelped about two months since, at Appledore, in Kent. Miss Chapman (known as the "British Lion Queen") was anxious to enter the den with the lions, tigers, and panthers, and to go through her usual perilous performances. This exhibition, however, by her Majesty's express command, was not permitted to take place while the Queen was present. Her Majesty, wishing to see the large elephant Iesemonah fully caparisoned, with the "Lion Queen" seated on its back, in the howdah, Miss Chapman, by her Majesty's command, rode round the Quadrangle, the elephant exhibiting some curious gambols, highly to the amusement of the Court; and, before leaving, the young Prince of Wales gave the elephant some buns and biscuits.

After her Majesty had retired, not only the domestics of the establishment, but the whole of the gardeners, labourers, and others engaged about the grounds were permitted, by command of the Queen, to view the Exhibition. One of the Equerries in Waiting was also dispatched by her Majesty to Dr. Hawtrey, at Eton, inviting the whole of the masters and the boys at College, to the number of between 600 and 700, to view the collection. Shortly afterwards the head master, accompanied by the Rev. Mr. Cocksley, the Rev. Mr. Luxmoore, and several other of the assistant masters, followed by the boys, arrived in the Quadrangle. Her Majesty, who was at this moment seen, with the Prince Consort and the Royal Family, standing at the centre window of the corridor, was greeted by the Etonians with three times three hearty cheers, the brass band of Mr. Wombwell performing the National Anthem. The band then performed the Coronation Anthem, the Coburg March, and other compositions during the time her Majesty and the Court were present. The "Lion Queen" went through her usual routine of den with the lions, tigers, panthers, and leopards several times immediately after her Majesty had retired. Mr. Wombwell, Mr. Edmonds, and the ladies of the establishment were invited to dinner in the steward's room, while the rest of the company, and the two caravans, containing the performing wild animals, having been detached from the rest, and drawn up on the eastern side of the Quadrangle, immediately beneath the windows of the corridor, a platform was erected, and a sumptuous feast was placed, twice four lighted oil lamps, supplied from the Castle. Shortly after seven o'clock, the Queen, the Prince Consort, with the Prince of Wales and the Royal Family, the Duchess of Kent, the visitors at the Castle, and the gentlemen and ladies of the Court, appeared at the windows, which were thrown open, of the corridor. Mr. Wombwell's band performing the National Anthem. Miss Chapman then commenced her performances before the Queen, shewing her astonishing command over the wild animals, highly to the gratification of her illustrious spectators. At the conclusion of this surprising exhibition, which lasted for nearly half an hour, her Majesty was pleased to express her approbation; that a most some acknowledgment be conveyed to the "Lion Queen," for the gratification she had afforded to the Sovereign and the Royal Family.

Mr. Wombwell's collection, we gather from the Windsor and Eton Express, comprises about 500 individual specimens of wild beasts and birds, many of them of a very rare description: including the Syrian gazelle, the Peruvian lama, the East Indian sacred bull, the Polar bear, the Australian emu, the majestic elephant, and a splendid assemblage of African and Asiatic lions, panthers, leopards, and Bengal tigers, and monkeys. Forty horses were employed to draw the caravans, fourteen in number, which contained the animals; and the expenditure of the establishment averages £40 a day. The collection possesses two additional merits firstly, the animals are kept in a condition of cleanliness, so that scarcely any unpleasant smell is perceivable in any part; and secondly, the brass band, which performs marches, waltzes, and overtures, during the exhibition, is an exceedingly good one. The Lion Queen performs the most extraordinary feats in the cages containing lions and leopards, sitting on them, feeding them, and even inserting her head into the jaws of the noble lion "Wallace," and, perhaps, with more self-possession than was exhibited either by Van Amburgh or Carter.

MUSIC.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

When I addressed my last letter to you, it was under the anticipation of being enabled to announce, in my present communication, the triumph on French operatic boards of a gifted English vocalist. I was present when Mr. Duponchel, the Director of the Academie Royal de Musique, announced to Miss Birch that her début was fixed for Friday last. A full rehearsal was accordingly on Thursday evening. On that morning I was informed that a change had taken place that a later night had been chosen by the management. An invitation having been given to attend the rehearsal, I arrived at the theatre in the beginning of the second act, when Mathilde, in Rossini's "Guillaume Tell," makes her entrance. I cannot describe to you my mingled feelings of disgust and indignation at finding Miss Birch at the wing of the stage alone, without a single person connected with the theatre, to support or to address her with a word of consolation. The trembling débutante about to appear before a French audience, in presence of the most distinguished artists of the day, on the grand stage—with Mr. Duponchel and Roqueplan, the present lessees—found only in two Englishmen, as it were accidentally present, the sympathy which her position ought to have secured from Gallic gallantry and charity. My blood boiled at the sight of the French officials connected with the stage, coldly and rudely pass by the English vocalist without a word of consideration without a smile of acknowledgment. Is it possible, I said to myself, that we have been so generous and hospitable to French artistes as to merit such a return as this? And yet the poor English woman went through the rehearsal with heroic courage. Her splendid voice, worth all the voices of the establishment put together, rang through the edifice, in thrilling strains; her deportment was easy and graceful. Dupres, who was singing "Arnold," recognised me from the wing. He came to speak to me. My utterance was choked, but I said to the great tenor, "I have assisted you in England; pray do all you can for Miss Birch." He muttered some words of empty compliment and disappeared. Then the small part she would appear, and then withdrew to sing in the trio. Miss Birch evidently felt that she was sacrificed, and was deeply affected. By the time the rehearsal was over, I was assured beyond a reasonable doubt, that the English vocalist would only perform the ill-used English artiste, thoroughly disgusted with the treatment she had been subjected to. Now, a word with MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan. Miss Birch did not seek them—they engaged her after her upwards of twenty appearances, and her début. They fixed the day for Friday last. They tell her at the eleventh hour that her accent is not sufficiently good for the delicate French ears. They admit that her voice is superior to any heard in Paris, but her style is not sufficiently refined. They acknowledge that the enunciation of the majority of French singers is so bad, that not a word can be distinguished. And yet they wantonly trifle with the feelings of a foreigner, without the slightest consideration for the rules of the laws of hospitality—they despise the dictates of reciprocity they are oblivious altogether to what we have done for French artistes in London—and they add insult to injury. May this be a lesson to us for the future. Miss Birch has been much indisposed since the rehearsal, but she is better this morning. The English in Paris are in a fury about her ill treatment.

Benefiet arrived here this day before yesterday from Stuttgardt. His opera (the "Crusaders") has been postponed, in consequence of the death of Madame Pischek. Pischek, after her decease, went off to Prague, where he remains in a distracted state.

Mitchell is expected to-morrow, from Brussels, to complete his arrangements for the Opera Comique, at the St. James's Theatre.

Grisi has generously sent £50 for the Albertuni family.

Dizi, the harpist member of the Philharmonic Society, is dead.

Costa arrived at the Hotel Meurice, from Italy, on Thursday, and left yesterday for England. Carlotta Grisi has gone to Brussels on a month's congé. Gosselin is gaining ground at the Académie. Auber's opera, at the Salle Favart, will be produced in a fortnight. Rossini has arrived here to dance at the Académie, as also the charming Carlotta Grisi. From Venice. The Opera National, under Adolphe Adam, will open in a few days. Verdi is still here superintending his "Jerusalem."

Is it possible that a pupil of Mdme. Pasta will appear in the season 1849, at the Royal Italian Opera, who is likely to eclipse every European singer.

M. Berlioz left Paris the day for London, to take the direction of the Drury-Lane Opera. Mdlle. Philion quitted the same day for the Princess' Theatre. Felicien David will visit London next spring

THE THEATRES.

LYCEUM.

It is some time since we have seen so comical a piece as "Box and Cox," produced at this theatre for the first time on Monday evening; and we rarely recollect one so completely in accordance with it. Indeed, it is the very description known to the profession as a "touch-and-go" piece, requiring great rapidity of action and dialogue, and very dangerous if the audience are permitted for half-a-minute to let their hearer or attention flag or wander. Mr. Morton, who farce it was, is, however, a very safe hand at pieces of this kind; and the fun must be poor indeed that cannot hit an audience, when interpreted by two such actors as Mr. Harley and Mr. Buckstone.

The notion of the plot is, in itself, droll. Mrs. Macnamara personates a lodging-house keeper, who has two lodgers, represented by the gentlemen above-named, and named Box and Cox. Mr. Buckstone is a compositor employed on a morning paper, so that his employment keeps him up all night; and Mr. Harley is a journeyman hatter, who is closely engaged all day; so that, to get a double rent, Mrs. Macnamara lets her room to both of them, as they meet at home together. At the beginning of the piece, we find Mr. Harley leaving home for the day, and directly afterwards Mr. Buckstone returns from his nightly toil, with a rasher of bacon, which he proceeds to cook for breakfast on a gridiron, and then lies down in the bed, to take "forty winks." Anon, Mr. Harley, who is not wanted at his shop, returns, and is about to broil a mutton-chop, which he carries with him for his breakfast, when he finds the gridiron occupied by Mr. Buckstone's rasher. This he indignantly throws out of window, and, putting down his own chop, goes to look after his breakfast-things, slamming the door after him. Roused from his slumbers by the noise of "Box and Cox," receiving no answer, gets up, and, to his astonishment, finds the chop, which he angrily throws below the rasher out of window. He then goes out to look after his accidental, and the two proceeded to cook for breakfast on a gridiron, with their respective trays of tea things, at the table. From this point, it is impossible to follow the action, which is so good and quick as in the well-known "Two in the Morning," and something of the same kind, keeping the house in roars of laughter. Quarrels, love stories, rivalries, and reconciliations, before fresh differences, follow one another, until at last they make friends for good; and, with a neat appropriate "cue," in which they state that they are really very comfortable in their new house, that everything looks very clean and nice, and that the landlady is evidently very anxious to please—all of which allusions were readily seized upon by the piece concludes.

"Box and Cox" is a great hit, and the management will find it so. The houses have been very good indeed, every night.

SURREY.

A melodrama of the old school, by Mr. Fitzball, called "The Travellers' Room," was brought out here on Monday evening, with complete success. The scene is laid in an inn on the Dundee, kept by a proscribed nobleman, with two reckless sons, one of whom murders his brother, mistaking him for a young wealthy traveller who has put up at the hostel for the night. The usual dramatic justice is done to the guilty parties; and a love affair, connected with the plot, is brought to a satisfactory termination. The principal characters were well played by Messrs. H. Hughes (who was most enthusiastically received), Fredericks, Vining, Osbourne, and Mary Taylor, and Mrs. W. West; and the piece will, without doubt, draw as good half-prices as the crowded audiences who flock to the operas will leave room for.

MARYLEBONE.

The judgment and intelligence that direct the affairs at this theatre have been again evidenced by the production of "The Bridal," which was played here, for the first time, on Monday evening. We regret how long it is since this piece was revived, under Mr. Macready's direction, at one of the large houses; but it must be at least ten or a dozen years, since which time it has been occasionally performed. The alterations required, in order that "The Maid's Tragedy" of Beaumont and Fletcher, with its very questionable plot, might be made palatable to an audience of the present day, were effected by Mr Sheridan Knowles: and the play, always a popular one in the seventeenth century, in spite of its lack of propriety, achieved a great success.

Evadne is one of Mrs. Warner's best characters; and she has done well in reviving "The Bridal," were it only for our own sakes. At the same time it showed Mr. Graham to appear to some advantage as Melantius; and Mr. G. J. Vining created a most favourable impression in the part of Aminter. Miss Angell, of whom we have had occasion more than once to speak in terms of high commendation, was Aspasia. One or two scenes of the play might have been improved; but it is scarcely fair to depreciate endeavours evidently made in the desire to do their very best on the part of all the company engaged in the representation; for it is an agreeable attribute of this management, as well as that of Sadler's Wells, that if nothing stands prominently forward from the ensemble, there is never anything that offends by its inferiority to the rest.

The house was well attended, the applause very hearty, and at the fall of the curtain, the principal actors were called for. The play was very carefully mounted.

SADLER'S WELLS.

We have every reason to congratulate the management of this theatre upon the production of the new play, "John Savile of Haysted," on Wednesday evening. The author, the Reverend Mr. White, is already favourably known to the public as the writer of two successful five act pieces, one of which, "The King of the Commons," was played at the Princess', and the other, "Feudal Times," at this house. In his last production he has gone away from Scottish history, and taken for his subject, the assassination of the Duke of Buckingham, at Portsmouth, by the fanatic Felton, interwoven with certain personages with the story, from the principal of whom a country gentleman residing in Suffolk, the [illegible] takes its name. At the commencement, we find Felton (Mr. G. Bennett), [illegible] (Miss Laura Addison), daughter of Sir Harry Hackett (Mr. H. Marston), and [illegible] a promised captaincy for services rendered on the battle-field. Buckingham lightly rejects his suit, being more occupied with his own dress and notions of Lilian (Miss Laura Addison), daughter of John Savile (Mr. Phelps), of whose beauty he hears much, and whom he is determined upon possessing. Meanwhile, Lilian, who is an enthusiastic and high-spirited girl, has heard much of the Duke, and formed an ideal image of him, which she almost venerates. Buckingham forms a scheme for her abduction, by delivering her from the pretended attack of two robbers, or rather fellows of his own in the disguise, and by this means carries her, without making himself known. Lilian has entertained a notion of seeking the Duke, and endeavouring to obtain from him a mitigation of some Government imposts which press heavily upon her father's estate, and under a series of pretences from Buckingham, still unknown to her, she elopes with him. All this time the madness of her kinsman, Felton gloomily foreshadowed at the very beginning of the play—is increasing, and he determines to murder Buckingham. Meeting the Duke, he draws upon him, but is disarmed and wounded; and this serves to deepen his hate. John Epsie (Mr. J. T. Johnson), an acquaintance of Buckingham, had formerly been the lover of Rose Savile, sister of Lilian. The Duke endeavours to make him assist his projects to ruin Lilian, by getting up a false marriage. This he will not consent to, and, stung by remorse, he discloses to Savile the position in which his friend and brother is placed. Upon his indignation he is bullied, Savile sends her some poison, Lilian still being detained by Buckingham. Believing that all hope of escape is lost, she takes the poison, just as Buckingham hails her by the title of Felton, and the Duke's murderer is the consternation of the play.

We are bound to record the entire and decided success of "John Savile of Heystead;" but we must at the same time speak of its faults. These were, an insufficiency of action for five acts, and one or two palpable errors of construction. The whole of the three first acts might have been put into one, as far as the progress of the piece is concerned; and the fall of the curtain on the fifth attributed the disapprobation—which, although but slight, was unmistakable—when the drop fell at the end of the third act. The great mistake, however, was the anti-climax at the end. Buckingham had been killed; Felton was dragged off; assisted to form a very imposing tableau; all interest was over, and the audience were applauding most enthusiastically, when the fall of the curtain upon a fine situation, when the fruit of success closed it in, and Lilian appeared, only to die from the poison. There was no reason for her dying. It turned the play into a tragedy, and occasioned nothing but disappointment. Had she survived, the [illegible] would have been awarded to him, and even as it was in the last scene, had it not been for its unfortunate position above alluded to. Mr. G. Bennett was powerful, and Mr. Phelps was fine. His deep voice, shaded with a profusion of countenance, produced a profound effect upon the audience. It is some time, we should imagine, since he has had a part to which he could do such entire justice. Mr. H. Marston was less successful as Buckingham: he looked well, did his best, but the character was beyond his capabilities. Mr. J. T. Johnson deserves great praise for his sensible and unassuming reading of the part entrusted to him. Mr. Wyndham fortunate in marrying Miss L. Addison was very effective as her heroine. We remember the sensation this clever young lady created by her account of the tournament, at the window, in "Feudal Times," and now, in the present play, she was fresh again to state that her powers were by no means exhausted, but

(a) This is inferior to K P one. (See the "Chess Player's Handbook," p. 280.)

(c) The situation is somewhat remarkable. Black could have played his Kt to K Kt 6th with the same effect.
(d) The utility of the sacrifice of the Queen is not evident.
(e) Very well played. After this, Black has not a shadow of a chance.

SUCCESS OF THE HUDSON'S BAY COMPANY'S ARCTIC EXPEDITION.

In July, 1846, the Company despatched an expedition of thirteen persons, under the command of Dr. John Rae, from Fort Churchill, in Hudson's Bay, for the purpose of surveying the unexplored portion of the Arctic coast, at the northeastern point of the American continent.

The expedition, which has just returned, has traced the coast all along from the Lord Mayor's Bay, of Sir J. Ross, to within a few miles of the Straits of the Fury and Hecla, proving thereby the correctness of Sir J. Ross's statement that Boothia Felix is a peninsula. From Dr Rae's Report to the Company the following interesting details are gathered:—Having divided his men into watches, the doctor started from Repulse Bay on the 22nd of July, 1846, and reached the most southerly opening of Wager River on the 22nd, where they were detained all day by immense quantities of heavy ice driving in with the flood and out again with the ebb tide, which ran at the rate of seven or eight miles an hour, forcing up the ice and grinding it against the rocks, causing a noise resembling thunder. On the 24th the party succeeded in making Repulse Bay, and cast anchor within eight miles of the head of the bay under shelter of a small island.

Here Dr. Rae found some Esquimaux Indians, with whom he quickly established friendly relations, and from a chart drawn by one of the party he inferred that the Arctic sea (named Achodlee) to the west of Melville Peninsula, was not more than forty miles distant, in a N.N.W. direction, and that about thirty-five miles of the distance was occupied by deep lakes; so that they would have only two miles of land to drag their boat over; a mode of proceeding he had decided upon, even had the distance been much greater, in preference to going round by the Fury and Hecla Strait. Here he established a wintering party, and having unloaded the boats, and placed one of them, with the smaller part of the cargo, in security, the other was hauled three miles up a rapid and narrow river, which flowed from one of the lakes they were to past through. This work occupied them the whole of the 25th, as the current was very strong, and the channel so full of large boulder stones that the men were frequently up to the waist in icecold water whilst lifting or launching the boat over these impediments.

Their landing-place was found to be in latitude 66° 32′ 10″ North. The rate of the chronometer had become so irregular that it could not be depended upon for finding the longitude, and during the winter it stopped altogether.

Proceeding according to the course he had adopted, the party and their adventurous leader on the 3rd of August, at 11 o'clock A.M., rounded a high bluff cape, which they called after the lady of Sir John Henry Pelly, Bart., Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company. It is situated in latitude 67° 28′ 00″ North; longitude, by account, 87° 40′ West.

Having succeeded, after surmounting many difficulties, in reaching Melville Peninsula, he was intimately obliged to retreat from the numerous obstacles that rendered his progress impossible, he therefore paid a short visit to the wintering party at Repulse Bay, to ascertain how they were getting on. Ultimately, he found himself obliged to give up all hope of prosecuting the survey on that occasion. His reasons we give in his own words:—"My reasons for arriving at this conclusion I shall here briefly mention, as such a step may seem somewhat premature. I saw, from the state of the ice and the prevalence of northerly winds, that there was no likelihood of our completing the whole of the proposed survey this season; and, although part of the coast, either towards the Strait of the Fury and Hecla or towards Dease and Simpson's furthest, might be traced, yet to accomplish even this might detain us so long, that there would be no time to make the necessary preparations for wintering, and we should thus be under the necessity of returning to Churchill without accomplishing the object of the expedition, or, if we remained at Repulse Bay, run the risk of starving, for I could obtain no supplies of pemmican from the natives, and all the provisions that we carried with us amounted to not more than four months' expenditure, which was all that our boats could carry. We should have thus to depend almost altogether on our own exertions for the means of existence both in regard to food and fuel."

The party, therefore, commenced preparations for passing the winter, and on the 2nd of September their house was furnished. Its internal dimensions were 21 feet long by 14 feet broad; height in front, 7½ feet, sloping to 5½ at the back. The roof was formed of oil-cloths and moose skin coverings, the masts and oars of our boats serving as rafters. The door was made of parchment deer skins stretched over a frame of wood. It was named Fort Jane, and was situated in latitude 66° 32′ 10″ North, longitude (by a number of sets of lunar distances) 85° 51′ West. The variation of the compass on the 30th August, 1846, was 42° 50′ 30″ West; dip of the needle 88° 14′; and the mean time of 100 vertical vibrations in the line of declination 226.

On the 8th of April in the present year, Doctor Rae commenced his spring journeys in company with three men, the Esquimaux Peter-Chook and Colin-Ak's son, as interpreter; and on the 16th, which was very stormy, with a temperature of 20° below zero, they arrived at the steep mud banks of a bay, called by their guide Ak-ku-li-gut-wiak. Its surface was marked with a number of high rocky islands, towards the highest of which (six or seven miles distant) they directed their course, and were, before sunset, comfortably housed under a snow roof. Early in the morning of the 17th, he set out in company with two of the men, for the purpose of following the coast to some point surveyed by Sir John Ross, as he felt confident that the veteran discoverer was correct in his opinion as to Boothia Felix being part of the American continent. They directed their course to the farthest visible land which bore N.W. (true).

Cape Berens (the point alluded to), is situated in latitude 69° 49′ 1″ North, and longitude 96° 59′ West. It is formed entirely of granite partially covered with moss. Thirteen miles beyond this, they arrived at two narrow points in the small bay, between which they built their snow hut.

As they were now near the latitude and longitude of Lord Mayor's Bay of Sir John Ross, he struck across land nearly in a north direction, and, at noon, when passing over a considerable lake, the latitude 69° 26′ 1″ North was observed. Advancing three miles beyond this, he reached another lake.

A walk of twenty minutes brought him to an inlet not more than a quarter of a mile wide. This he traced to the westward for three miles, when his course was again obstructed by land. Ascending some high rocks, from which a good view could be obtained, he thought he could distinguish rough ice in the desired direction. With renewed hopes, he set out at a rapid pace, plunging among deep snow, scrambling over rocks and through rough ice, until he arrived at the rising ground close to the beach. From the spot where he now stood, as far as the eye could see, to the north-west, lay a large extent of ice-covered sea, studded with innumerable islands. Lord Mayor's Bay was before him, and the islands were those named by Sir John Ross, the Sons of the Clergy of the Church of Scotland.

The isthmus which connects the land to the northward with Boothia Felix is only one mile broad, and, judging by the number of stone marks set up on it, it appeared to him to be a favourite resort of the natives. Its latitude is 69° 31′ North; longitude, by account, 95° 29′ 30″ West.

After taking possession of his discoveries with the usual formalities, the Doctor returned to his quarters on the island above mentioned, where, as they were all more or less affected with snow-blindness, and the dogs were still weak, they remained on the island, which he found to be situated in latitude 68° 53′ 44″ North; longitude, by account, 89° 38′ 30″ West. It is formed almost entirely of granite, and is upwards of 730 feet above the level of the sea. From the highest point of it, he obtained a fine view of the bay, and was thus saved the trouble of tracking the shores. It extends sixteen or eighteen miles to the southward, and contains a number of rocky islands, the highest of them being that on which they encamped.

The bay was named Felly Bay, after the Governor of the Company; and the group of islands, Harrison Islands.

The party, on their return, traced the shores of the tracts across which they had made overland journeys when coming out. The country was low, flat, and very regular in outline. They arrived at Repulse Bay on the 5th of May, all safe and well, but as black as Negroes, from the combined effects of frost bites and oil smoke.

The Doctor subsequently traced the west shore of Melville Bay, and for that purpose started on the evening of the 13th of May.

The hardships of the service, and the hardships to be endured on such expeditions, may be understood from the few short extracts from the Report, in reference to this last exploring visit:—"Our snow-house, on the 25th, was built in lat. 68° 48′ N., long. 88° 4′ W., amid a small stream, from which the country was low, flat, and to the bottom. We had not yet obtained a drop of water of nature's thawing, and, fuel being rather a scarce article we sometimes took small kettles of snow under the blanket with us, to thaw it with the heat of our bodies. Leaving two men to endeavour to fish and shoot, I went forward with the others, and crossed Garry Bay, passing inside a number of islets."

The party set out again after but on the 25th, where, says the report—"The men we had left here were well, but very thin, as they had neither caught nor shot anything eatable, except two marmots. Had we been absent two hours more, they were to have cooked a piece of parchment skin for supper.

The whole party returned safe and well to York Factory, on the 6th of September last.

Voluntary Game Reform.—The Duke of Marlborough has addressed a circular to his tenantry giving them permission to destroy hares and rabbits on their farms by all possible means except the use of guns. He suggests greyhounds as the most desirable. In return he expects they will preserve the winged game, and advance no claims against him for any future injury to crops.

A HORSE FOR SALE. BY SAM SLICK.

He is great, that's a fact; a perfect case, I assure you. He can trot 'is mile in two minutes and thirty seconds, and no break, shuffle-rack, or pace, but a handsome round trot, with splendid knee action; not pawing the air like makebelieve, nor pounding the road like breaking stones, but a sort of touching-light-and-go-easy style, like the beat of a gall's finger on the pianny; and so gentle, a child can manage him. When you want him to go, take up the reins, and he's off like a fox; when you want him to stop, throw them down, and he'll stand all day. The way he makes the spokes fly round in a wheel, so that you can only see the rim, as if it was a hoop, is amazing. It frightened me at first, and I allot easy scared by a horse. He is a no-actor animal, beyond all doubt. I never was suited before in all my life, and I don't know as he aint spoilt me, I never shall be suited again. Sometimes I think I can't part with him any how, for I can't never get another like him; and sometimes I take a notion into my head I ought to sell him, as it is too much money for a poor man like me to have in a horse. You've heern tell of Heber of Windsor, haven't you? Well, he's crazy after him, and if he don't know a good one when he sees him, he does when he sees him, and that's more than most men do. I'd like you to have him, for you are a judge of a horse—perhaps the best in these parts (though I've seen the leak you into you, too, afore now). You will take good care of him, and I wouldn't like to see the critter knocked about like a corn. He will lead your tandem beautiful, and keep his traces up without doing the whole work and killing himself. A thread will guide him; and then he knows how to back up a going-down hill, so as not to drag the wheeler off his legs. Oh! he's a doll! His sinews are all sarcipien tallo and whipcords, and he's muscle enough for two beasts of his size. You can't fault him in no particular, for he is perfect, head or neck, shoulder or girth, back or loins, stifle or hock, or chest and pastions; and, as for hoofs, they actilly seem as if they was made a purpose for a trotter. In fact, you may say he's the greatest piece of stuff ever wrapped up in horse-hide.—Fraser's Magazine.

BRIGHTON AIR.

As the London season was drawing to a close, and as every civilized person had flown from the horrid dust of London to the refreshing breezes of the seaside, Mamma was sensible of a sensation akin to low spirits, and I felt mine so weak and delicate, that we both agreed that nothing but two or three months at Brighton would restore our healths. So I used to tell Papa that it was positively frightful to see how Mamma was wasting every day for want of change of air, and that I shouldn't like to answer for the consequences if she remained much longer in London; and Mamma would in her turn declare that if she had to go down on her bended knees and implore the mercy of the Minister strangers, we must go out of town somewhere. She didn't speak for herself, though she felt that she was every day sinking more and more for want of a mouthful of fresh air, and, indeed, knew that each weak she remained in town at that season of the year as good as ten long years off her life. But she could not, as a mother, stand still, and see that dear Charlotte growing as white as a plaster cast, under her very eyes, for the want of a few weeks' residence at some fashionable watering-place. And she could and would tell him this, that however clever he might think himself as a physician, still she, as a mother, knew much more of her daughter's constitution than he possibly could. And the end of it all was that if he couldn't afford the money for her to take me down to the sea-side, he would be obliged, before long, to afford the money for my funeral expenses, and that then—when it was too late—he'd have the happiness of knowing that he had been the murderer of his eldest and finest girl. As we neither of us ever ate anything at dinner with Papa, though we kept pressing each other to try as much as would go on a fork once, and rumbling one another that exhausted nature may give way, under the little nutriment we took, Papa at last gave us his consent, and a cheque to go down to Brighton.—Whom to Marry and How to Get Married.

ALBERT THORVALDSEN.—BY H. C. ANDERSEN

This man's poetical life, this triumphal procession, can be painted with words as well as with colours. If we should give a vignette, heralding the whole, we would then trace three large fields, and in the uppermost draw a thick, well-grown, Danish beech-forest, where the King stands before the altar of unhewn stones, his hair girt round with a thick golden ring, and himself surrounded by a circle of priests. This is Denmark's King, Harald Hildetand. His eye sparkles, his head is proudly raised; what have the great gods promised him? That one of his race shall, in future ages, extend his sceptra from the North Cape to the southernmost point of Europe; that from the east and west his name is written in the book of nations. We will draw the next field in the heraldic upright: centuries have passed away; it is in our times. A poor boy, with a little rod cap on his flaxen head, is seen carrying an earthen jar, suspended by a pack-thread, through one of the narrow streets of Copenhagen; he is taking food to his father, who works in the dockyard as a carver of figure-heads for vessels. Look well at this child; he is the youngest of King Harald Hildetand's race, and through him the prophecy shall be fulfilled,—but how? We will, sketch the third field: the boy has become a man, and his flaxen hair white; but it hangs in rich folds over his herculean shoulders. Round about are many splendid marble figures,—Jason with the golden fleece, the Graces, the holy Apostles. This is the artist-king we see, the descendant of Harald Hildetand, the poor boy who now, as a man, exercise his sceptre over Europe's lands in the kingdom of genius is Albert Thorvaldsen.—(From a charming Biographical Sketch in Bentley's Miscellany; an admirable relief to the witless vapidity of the majority of the other pieces in this Number.)

TRAVELLING DISGUISES.

"You may meet your dearest friend in an Alpine party, and not recognize him. The lawyer exchanges his wig and gown for a straw hat and a blouse. The doctor arrays himself as a chamois-hunter, and tries to look as if he only killed game. That personage who is so very like a bandit on the Rhigi, is not very remote from one in London either, for he is an attorney in Sergeant's Inn. That desperate-looking Whiskerando, in a French casquette and Russia-duck, is a quiet curate when he is at home in Essex. But who, in the name of all that is marvellous, is that romantic figure, with a coloured beaver, pistols in his belt, brandishing his pole like a battle-axe, now and then winding his horn like a mountain-chief, and brown and bearded as a field of ripe wheat? Can it be William Tell?—can it be Werner Stauffacher—can it be the immortal three of Grüth? No! by all that is outrageous, I know him now. It is Mr. Thomas Perkins of Aldermanbury!—Dublin University Magazine.

AN ARTIST'S PAINTING-ROOM.

It was a large uncarpeted apartment, lighted by one out of three windows, and that was half-closed by a shutter, the others being entirely obscured. There did not appear to have been a broom in it for many years, and, indeed, it was awful to speculate upon the amount of damage that would have attended the introduction of one; for every available corner was occupied by a plaster cast, or a small bottle of something, the contents of which nobody could form a further idea of than that it would make a terrible mess if knocked over. The plaster casts were all fragments large hands, tremendous toes, agonised heads, expressing such screaming pain that you winced to look at them, and decapitated and dismembered trunks, hoisted up on shelves and brackets in most helpless state, all, more or less, smoked and grubby. Then there were mysterious sketches and pictures the most valuable of which were altogether invisible, appearing to have been painted with pitch and red ochre in the literally dark ages; and by the side of these were, here and there, beaming female faces of the present day which were very little prized, since only the disciples of low art cared to produce natural and pleasing objects. And there were quantities of indoor and gentlemen upon unframed canvass leaning against one another, like slates for roofing; whilst over everything hung an atmosphere of dust and varnish, with a suspicion of turpentine, as thick that, whenever the sunbeams got by chance into the room, they floated upon it at their ease, coming out remarkably strong with such a good medium for display.—Christopher Tadpole.

APPALLING INCIDENT

"CHICKEN," AFTER HIS DEMISE:

This gentleman awakened in Miss Nipper some considerable astonishment; for, having been defeated by the Larkey Boy, his visage was in a state of such great beauty as to be hardly presentable in the parlour. But it appeared from the publication of that great contest that the Larkey Boy had had it all his own way from the beginning, and that the Chicken had been rapped, and banged, and had received proper, and had been made game, and had come up piping, and had endured a complication of similar strange inconveniences, until he had been gone into and finished.—Dombey and Son.

THE COMMONWEALTH.

The old constitutional principle, that too many cooks spoil the broth, having been rapidly exemplified, it was declared expedient to have "a commonwealth in a single person," or, in other words, to have a king with a decorative name, which is the invariable result of the polley of red-hot republicans. Cromwel. was, of course, the unit who had put himself down as A 1 for the new office, and he therefore, after mounding or getting himself chosen by the title of Lord Protector of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Thus, though the people had cut off the head of a real King, another head grew in its place, for Government is like the hydra, which must have a head, however often the process of decapitation may be carried into execution. The brewer had, in fact, mashed up the constitution so completely as if he had used one of his own mash-tubs for the purpose, and his upstart usurpation was such a pitch, that the new workmen cussing, "Who's hoo? think small beer of himself," was first applied in reference to this dealer in ale and stout, who, it was clumsily observed, had "gone the entire" in his great audacity.—Comic History of England.

HOW TO LIVE WELL ON NOTHING A YEAR.

Rawdon and his wife generously gave their patronage to all such of Miss Crawley's tradesmen and purveyors as chose to serve them. Some were willing enough, especially the poor ones. It was wonderful to see the perfumery with which the washerwoman from Tooting brought the cart every Saturday, and her bills week after week. Mr. Raggles himself had to supply the greengroceries. The bill for servants' porter at the Fortune of War public house is a curiosity in the chronicles of beer. Every servant, also, was owed the greater part of his wages, and thus kept up perforce an interest in the house. Nobody in fact, was paid. Not the blacksmith who opened the lock, nor the glazier who mended the pane; nor the jobber who let the carriage; nor the groom who drove it; nor the butcher who provided the leg of mutton, nor the cook which roasted it; nor the cook who basted it; nor the servants who eat it: and this, I am given to understand, is not unfrequently the way in which people live elegantly on nothing a year.—(From Vanity Fair, one of its rarest Numbers.)

MEET OF HER MAJESTY'S BUCKHOUNDS, AT SALT-HILL.

HER MAJESTY'S BUCKHOUNDS.

On Monday, the first public meet this season with the Royal Buckhounds took place at Salt Hill. The field consisted of upwards of five hundred well-mounted horsemen; in addition to whom there was an immense number of persons to witness the turn-out of the deer, which took place at Two-mile Brook, between Slough and Maidenhead. It was expected by many that the Prince Consort would have honoured the first meet with his presence. Lord Granville, the Master of the Buckhounds, accompanied by Lord Rivers, arrived at Salt-Hill just after the uncarting of the stag, which had been for some time delayed in consequence of the absence of his Lordship.

The celebrated stag, Rory O'More, which had been selected for the opening day's sport, took away in beautiful style to Burnham Beeches, doubling round to Maidenhead thicket, and thence right away across the country, through Bisham and Little Marlow, crossing the Thames to Great Marlow; and was taken, after a long run of upwards of three hours, in a piece of water on the estate of Sir George Nugent, within a short distance of the town. There were several checks during the run, in consequence of the extreme dryness of the ground causing the scent to lie badly. Not more than a dozen, including Captain Seymour and a party of Polish gentlemen, Mr. Oliver, with the Royal huntsman and whippers-in, were up at the finish.

NOTTINGHAM NEW GENERAL POST-OFFICE.

The ceremony of laying the "First Stone" of this Edifice was fixed for eleven o'clock on Thursday, the 14th ult., when the Right Worshipful the Mayor, the Sheriff, the Town Council, and many other gentlemen of the borough, preceded by the "Mayor's Sergeant" (in his purple gown, richly trimmed with gold lace), carrying the gold mace; the two Bailiffs, in their scarlet coats, carrying silver maces; and the Pedars, in their livery of "Lincoln green;" left the Exchange, and proceeded along the Market-place, down Wheeler-gate, and partly along Albert-street, to the site of the new building.

A bottle, hermetically sealed, was deposited in a cavity at the west end of the Stone, containing specimens of silk hose, lace, gloves, and cotton hose, and bobin-net, all of Nottingham manufacture; also, coins of the present reign; a plan of the town of Nottingham; and of the immediate locality of the proposed building.

On the east end of the Stone a brass plate was fixed, bearing this inscription:

This Corner Stone of the New General Post-Office, erected on part of the Bridge Estate of the Corporation of Nottingham, was laid by WILLIAM GRIPTH, Esquire, Mayor,
on Thursday, the 14th day of October, 1847
John Hill, Merchant, Chairman.
James Tomlinson, Gentleman.
Alderman Thomas Oerser, Merchant
William Taylor, Merchant
John Galloway, Merchant
Charles Beck, Merchant
Samuel Parker, Gentleman.
} Com-mittee.

Thus "Corner Stone," which weighed about one ton, was then elevated by a pulley, when the Mayor, with an elegant silver trowel, assisted in spreading the mortar on the foundation, preparatory for its reception.

The Stone having been lowered into its destined bed, the Mayor next applied the plumb rule, the square, and the level, all of which were made of polished mahogany, for the occasion, and then, with a mallet of like material, he gave to the Stone three blows on its upper surface.

His Worship having removed his hat, and stepping to a more elevated platform, addressed the assembled multitude as follows: "Except the Lord build the house, they labour in vain that build it. Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain." The Mayor then stated that the last occasion on which the municipal authorities of the town, in their corporate capacity, met for an object similar to the present, was in 1781, when they assembled to lay the foundation stone of the General Hospital.

The Mayor next read a variety of interesting statistics of the Nottingham Post-Office, with which he had been furnished by the Surveyor. Thus, it was stated that, "for many years up to 1831, the room in which the entire business of the Establishment was conducted was about 500 or 700 cubic feet of space; whilst the proposed Building will contain 16,184 cubic feet. Some fifty years ago, the London mail departed daily, at six o'clock P.M., and reached Nottingham on the following day at the like hour; but letters were not delivered until the next morning, unless called for. The Post-Office time in 1835 was—from London to Nottingham, 13h. 21m.; in 1847 it is 7h. 20m."

There has also been very nearly a fourfold increase in the number of Money Orders issued in five years. "The number of letters delivered in Nottingham and its neighbourhood during the year 1845 was 1,238,692; the number for the present year, assuming the past nine months to afford pretty correct data, will be 1,589,212."

The Mayor then, in an impressive address, made a well-timed reference to the beneficial results of this postal extension, and concluded with a devout hope for returning prosperity to our manufactures and commerce.

Nine good hearty cheers and "one more" were then given, and a lively peal burst forth from the bells of St. Peter's Church.

Within the inclosure a large assemblage of ladies were accommodated on benches, their presence adding considerable interest to the ceremony. A vast number of persons were also assembled to witness the ceremony without the inclosure. Albert-street was completely filled, to the interruption of public traffic; and the south side of St. Peter's churchyard was lined with spectators. The Architect of the new edifice is Mr. H. M. Wood, the Corporation Surveyor; and the builders are Messrs. Walker.

Within the substructure of the proposed building are the kitchen, scullery, and other domestic offices of the Postmaster, whilst the ground-floor story is entirely appropriated to the official business of this establishment. To the north will be a portico, after the Temple of Theseus, at Athens, into which three windows will open: here will be the receiving-boxes, &c.

Under an adjacent piazza, and immediately eastward, opening into St Peter's Gate, will be the entrances to the private dwelling of the Postmaster, and also to the Post Office, wherein the bags will be received from, and despatched by, the respective mails.

To the west, and fronting Albert-street, will be the boxes or receiving prepaid letters; thus separating, as far as practicable, the several inlets and issues of busy correspondence passing through this establishment.

The ground story exteriorly will be of rusticated Mansfield freestone, surmounted by a continuous cornice with that of the portico.

The next story will be used as the family living rooms of the Postmaster; whilst the attic or upper story will be altogether a dormitory.

These upper stories will be of brick, covered with Roman cement, and protected by rusticated stone quoins, except that the pedimented window over the portico will be of like cleansed Mansfield stone. The proportions of this window are taken from the little temple on the Ilyssus.

NEW GENERAL POST-OFFICE AT NOTTINGHAM.

Loss of the Dublin Steamer, "Tribune." The loss of this vessel on Wednesday morning so'night, on the coast of Wexford, was reported at Lloyd's on Saturday last. The Tribune, which was rigged as a three-masted steam-sloop, was worked on the screw propeller principle, her tonnage being between 200 and 300 tons. She sailed from the river on Friday week, with a heavy and valuable cargo, but fortunately without any passengers. Twelve hours after, she encountered most fearful weather, the wind blowing tremendously from the N.W., during the three succeeding days. Though greatly damaged and knocked about by the heavy seas she shipped, she braved it out, and was running along the coast of Ireland, when, about three o'clock in the morning, in rounding Carnsore Point, ten miles southward of Wexford, she ran ashore with great force near a place called Cumshane, where in less than an hour she went to pieces. The crew were saved. It is feared the amount of the insurance will not cover the entire loss, viz., £10,000.

NEW STATUE IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

A FINE marble Statue, from the chisel of Mr. Behnes, has just been erected in the south transept of St. Paul's Cathedral, not far from the monument to Lord Howe.

The new Statue is the vera effigies of Major-General Sir John Thomas Jones, R.E., a distinguished officer in the Peninsular war, and known to civilians, as well as military men, by his valuable "Journal of the Sieges in Spain, 1811—13."

The Statue will add to the fame of Mr. Behnes, the sculptor: there is an intellectual vigour in the head; the attitude is easy, and not ungraceful; and the minor points of costume have been attended to.

The pedestal is to bear the following inscription:—

HARTLEPOOL LIGHTHOUSE.

THIS new Light, at Hartlepool, Durham, was first exhibited about a month since. It occupies a prominent position upon the eastern extremity of the peninsula, jutting out into the sea, a few miles from the Tees' mouth, and upon which is built the town of Hartlepool.

The Lighthouse is a handsome structure of white freestone—the building itself being fifty feet in height; but, owing to the additional height of the cliff, the Light is exhibited at an elevation of nearly eighty-five feet above high-water mark. On the eastern side of the building is placed a balcony, supporting a lantern, from which a small red light is exhibited, to indicate that state of the tide which will admit of the entrance of ships into the harbour; the corresponding signal in the day-time being a red ball hoisted to the top of the flag-staff. The Lighthouse is furnished with an anemometer and tidal gauge; and its appointments are altogether of the most complete description. It is chiefly, however, with regard to the system adopted in the lighting arrangements that novelty presents itself.

The main object in the instance of a light placed as a beacon to warn mariners of their proximity to a dangerous coast, is to obtain the greatest possible intensity and amount of penetrating power. A naked or simple light is, therefore, seldom, if ever, employed; but whether it proceed from the combustion of oil or gas it is equally necessary that it should be combined with some arrangement of optical apparatus, in order that the rays emitted may be collected, and projected in such a direction as to render them available to the object in view. The apparatus employed in light-houses is of two descriptions, Catoptric and Dioptric. In the former, the rays are received upon a surface of highly polished metal, from which they are reflected; the parabolic curve is generally adopted for such reflectors; and, as the light is placed at the focus of the parabola, the rays are projected in a parallel sense, and render the form of a cylinder of intense light, the diameter of the cylinder depending upon the area of the reflector employed. In the Dioptric system, the rays are transmitted through an arrangement of lenses and glass zones, by the refractive power of which they are projected parallel with respect to their vertical sense; but diverging horizontally, so that, instead of the luminous cylinder obtained by means of the parabolic reflector, an illuminated zone or belt of light is produced. In the Hartlepool Lighthouse, both these systems have, to a certain extent, been adopted, and the illuminative medium is gas. The optical apparatus embraces three-fourths of the circumference of the circle which encloses the light, and the whole of the rays emanating from that part of the light opposed to the optical arrangement are reflected or refracted (as the case may be), so that they are projected from the Lighthouse in such a direction as to be visible from the surface of the ocean.

The application of gas to the illumination of Lighthouses has always been regarded as an important and desirable step. Mr. Stevenson, in evidence before a Committee of the House of Commons, remarked that "the great desideratum with respect to the lighting of Lighthouses, was a gas-burner of large size, and that it was in that direction that improvement was to be sought." Hitherto, however, no gas-burner has been constructed, capable of furnishing the necessary amount of light, combined with the steadiness, intensity, and solidity of flame requisite to render its application advantageous as a substitute for the oil lamp.

As a means of illumination, gas possesses numerous advantages over oil; and under no circumstances are those advantages more strongly displayed than in the case of a Lighthouse, where simplicity in the machinery, facility of management, and certainty of effect, are objects of the greatest importance.

The gas-burner employed in the present instance, appears to supply that which has so long been wanting: it is constructed on the most philosophical principle, its chief peculiarity lying in the method employed to supply the air necessary to the perfect combustion of the gas. This supply is not only regulated with great exactness, but all the parts by which the air passes are placed on such angles that the impinging air is reflected and forced directly into the flame at the precise point in which it will conduce most powerfully to support the combustion. At the same time, the requisite quantity only is admitted; and therefore the flame is perfectly steady, and not, as it is technically termed, distressed and driven into spires by too powerful and rapid a current of air. The inverted cone placed in the centre, is hollow and the air which is admitted by the tube which supports it, issues into the flame by a row of holes placed round the periphery of its base. By these contrivances, the burner is made to produce a rich opaque mass of flame, affording a powerful and steady light; and, when placed in the centre of the optical arrangement of lenses, lenticular zones, and mirrors, an immense amount of intense light is spread over the horizon.

In the instance now before us, the capability of gas to produce a light sufficiently powerful, was satisfactorily proved; for, in some cases, it was distinctly seen on board ships at least eighteen miles distant from the coast; the gas, on this occasion, was used in its ordinary condition; but, in future, it is proposed to naphthalise the gas, and, in that case, the power of the light will be increased by at least twenty per cent.

The Lighthouse was built and the optical apparatus planned by Mr. Stephen Robinson, Civil Engineer, Hartlepool. The burner is that patented by Messrs McNeil and Co., 60, St. Martin's-lane, who fitted up these employed in the Lighthouse, and all the arrangements for lighting with gas.

WALKER'S PATENT HYDRAULIC ENGINE.

THE art of raising water is of very high antiquity. From the days of Archimedes of Syracuse, a great amount of talent has been directed to this object, and an incredible number of machines have been devised for this purpose; many of them displaying much ingenuity, and possessing great practical usefulness. A much larger number, however, have been so fallacious in their results and impracticable in execution, that they have merely served the purpose of philosophical toys on the lecture-table. The limited ingenuity of man can never create power, but the economical development and judicious application of power furnishes fruitful employment for the highest of human intelligences. In modern times the discovery of Watt, as applied to the pumping engines of the deep mines in Cornwall, constitutes one of the most perfect applications of natural laws and mechanical combination to which we are indebted. In these engines, the power, velocity, and load, are so accurately adjusted to each other, that little or none of the power is wasted; and this is accomplished by the expansive property of steam acting in conjunction with the pressure of the water put in motion. For deep well pumps, perhaps, this principle of working will never be surpassed; but there are numberless occasions where it is desirable to raise large quantities of water to comparatively small heights, as, for instance, for draining, irrigating, &c. Indeed, the great attention which landed proprietors are now giving to the subjects of draining, and the large tracts of land which at present lie waste and unemployed for want of drainage, call for such an application of engineering skill as will most economically effect this nationally-important object.

Mr. John Walker has for some time past given much attention to the subject of practical Hydraulics, and introduced several notable improvements. His "Hydraulic Engine," for which he has obtained her Majesty's Letters Patent, accomplishes for drainage what the Cornish engine does for deep mines. The respective representation shows this Engine to consist of a strong cast-iron framing, about four feet square, within which all the machinery is contained. On a table at the upper part there are two steam-cylinders, each 11 inches in diameter, and immediately beneath them are two water-cylinders, each 24 inches in diameter.

From cross-heads above the steam-cylinders, and attached to the steam-pistons, connecting-rods pass down, and are coupled in platforms which connect them to the water-pistons. The water-cylinders are open at the bottom, and are immersed in a cast-iron well, fitted with sluices, to admit water from the drains or from the river, so as to be equally applicable for draining or for supplying. The water-cylinders terminate at the upper part in a capacious valve-box, communicating with the delivery-main, which is also furnished with sluice-doors for discharging the water inland or outwards. The valves in the water-cylinders and pistons are of a novel and excellent construction; consisting of a large number of rolled iron tubes, which lie in circular seatings across the piston, rising and falling in guides which limit their motion. By this arrangement a very free passage is afforded to the water, and the valve acts without the slightest shock, even when the engine is working at a high velocity.

The steam-cylinders. The single acting, steam being admitted alternately between [illegible] by an eccentric in the crank shaft, which connects the two steam pistons and carries a fly wheel which regulates the action of the engine. Two of these machines, constructed for draining estates in the Isle of Wight, have recently erected and tested at Mr. Walker's premises in the Wharf-road, City-road. With steam of 35 lbs upon the inch, and making 70 revolutions per minute, the piston stroke being 9 feet, they lifted 6000 gallons of water 8 feet high per minute.

As these engines throw up the water—not lift it—the ordinary mode of computing the performance of the engine (in capacity multiplied by in velocity) is inapplicable. At the speed stated, that mode of calculating gave less than half the quantity actually raised, and, at an increased speed, the disproportion would be even still greater. The superiority of Mr. Walker's engine over the ordinary pump has been most satisfactorily established in the presence of Sir Francis Collier and Capt. Denilson, at Woolwich Dockyard, where the large caisson was formerly emptied by a pair of very excellent London pumps, fitted up in the best manner by Sir John Rennie's firm. With these pumps it took 30 men (working in gangs of 15, and relieving every 15 minutes) three hours and a-half to empty the caisson. With one of Mr. Walker's engines, 4 men (working in gangs of 7, and relieving every 15 minutes) emptied the caisson in one hour and a quarter, and have, on recent occasions, done it in less, without being fatigued. Mr. Walker has supplied one of his on trial for the Dock-yard at Malta, and has just completed another for Portsmouth. The Board of Admiralty are about to adopt this important invention in ships of the largest class, which may thus be kept afloat when other appliances would fail. Mr. Walker has erected engines for the Parliamentary Commissioners for draining in Sennersetshire, Norfolk, and in Lincolnshire. At the estate of Mr. Houil, Ranham, Norfolk, a large tract of land has this year grown the finest corn, which has been hitherto unrivalled, from the impossibility of draining it by the means heretofore employed.

The proprietors of estates in the West Indies have watched the completion of these machines with much anxiety, and they are satisfied that Mr. Walker's engines will entirely avert the only two evils of any magnitude they have now to contend with—viz., alternate floods and drought.

THE MONEY PRESSURE.

BANK RESTRICTION.
Poor melancholy wight! restricted
By what Currency ordained,
Cramp'd, confined, and interdicted,
Baffled, bridled, and restrained!

Who shall measure thine affliction
In the crisis of distress?
That an absolute "RESTRICTION,"
Halts with "Neither more nor less!"

Fixes with a dread decision
Where to go and what to stop,
No redress, and no revision:—
Thy and visage well may drop!

"BANK RESTRICTION," cold and stony,
Answers Reason's sharp regret,
With a stern "Non e passo," Defying "Volumus sist."

"I have will do" not that suffice you,"
"What, though "holding," bumpo trade,
Credit fail, and in a trice you
Run aground for want of aid.

"You may flounder where you tumble,
Lie
I, unmoved, look on at will,
While you kneel among the rumble,
I stand BANK RESTRICTION still!

"THREE MILLION RELIEF."
Hurrah! on the side of Sense I as set
The Ship of "Money" fro-
The boaster and the bulker
Lies stranded 'neath her lee!

"RESTRICTION," Sense disables—
The "Trade Bark" wrecks the gale;
While Wisdom cuts the cables,
And Poesty fl.s the sail!

Help rushes open-hearted
Where, glad and unconfin'd,
Fair Enterprise has started
Upon her Manes of Mind!

RESTRICTION overboarded,
Without a raft or plank
The tyrant wealths lie hoarded
Flows freely from Lay Bank.

THE MONEY PRESSURE.

BANK RESTRICTION.

"THREE MILLION RELIEF."

Hurrah! I was a sorrower
When yesterday began,
For Bank Restriction made me
A meek and mournful man.

But now the ban is off, my voice
Of joy rings through the land;
And I, beside my notes of glee,
Have notes in either hand!

RUN UPON A BANK.

A Run upon a Bank! What cry
Has panic'd all the street
That decent people run agog,
And tilt at all they meet!

A Run upon a Bank, alas!
But that can be no fun,
For many a bank must cease to stand
When men begin to run!

Nor does it seem a laughing theme,
Nor inconsistent sport!
The people running very long,
The money very short!

And yet, how eagerly Mistrust
Will do the desperate deed,
And rush with hardest pressure
Where it hears of hardest need!

A whisper floats, and London roars
Good folks draw out your cash!
Then up turn eyes! and cheque-book flies!
Rush! Crush! Run! Dun! Smash!
Crash!

And wheels lose spoke—and bones are broke,
And Life gets out of clover—
And many folks are over-run
Before the run is over!

PRESENTING A BILL.

Tradesman! count thy money-shower!
Take the notes from out thy till!
This the day, and this the hour!
At thy counter lo! a Bill!

Thy poor heart and brain have flurried
Many an anxious beat and thrill;—
For the sluggish Money worried,
Watcher! that must meet thy Bill.

RUN UPON A BANK.

Thou hast toiled, and scraped, and hoarded,
Finding easy by force of will,
Till at last thy means afforded
Wherewithal to meet thy Bill!

While thou standest—sad reflector—
Grieved that he will leave thee "out,"
Cold and bland the boy-collector
Now is picking out thy "Bill."

Pen and Ring are blazed before thee
While he finds thy bitter "pill"—
Visions of his bank come o'er thee,
Interrupted by the "Bill."

Most unwelcome Serenader!—
Ruffling all thy Temper's frill!
He shall leave thee—hapless trader!
"The Bill, and nothing but the Bill.'

NOTING A BILL.

'Tis half-past eight—a driving night,
And pelting after dark!
Eat! tat!—go Betty, bring a light—
It is the Notary's clerk!

"Pray, what's your pleasure?"—"Why you see,
It's raining beyond measure,
And tho' I come to tend a Bill,
It's any thing but pleasure."

"A Bill!—eh! it's so wet to-night,
That master gave me warning,
If you should call he'd see about
The Bill, sir, in the morning!"

"The morning!—I've come all this way
Then, just to get wet coated—
The morning!—bless your pretty eyes,
By then it will be noted!"

Miss Betsy, as she sees his plight,
And's half inclined to quiz it,
Returns with smile his sly "good night,"
And so farewells his visit.

Master next morn a letter gets,
Which there is no misquoting,
With "Bill dishonnured," "Lawyer's fee,"
And three-and-sixpence noting!

BILL FOR PAYMENT.

No. 289.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1847. [Sixpence.

THE CITY PAGEANT.

BY THE lapse of time, and the change of manners, we are outgrowing many old usages. Pageantry has become rare in England, almost as rare as a bright day in November to display it in; but, both combined on Tuesday last to give éclat to the City Spectacle. London has no Carnival; but it has preserved something almost as picturesque, though grave, as it becomes the festival celebrations of a money-making City to be. The masques that formed part of the Processions formerly, sometimes were rather exuberant in fancy, and would hardly now be tolerated; still, enough has been kept to form a very striking exception to the aspect of every-day life. But, from the bearing of those who play a part in the Spectacle, and the behaviour of the spectators, an observer is compelled to feel that the tendency of the age is not favourable to these spectacles, shorn as they have been of most of their old magnificence. The spirit of the old guilds and corporations is dying out: it may be presumed they have done their work in this world, and may be dismissed. Even those whose professions endow them with the privilege of wearing a peculiar costume avail themselves of it as seldom as possible. A modern king wears his crown perhaps twice a year; bishops have discontinued wigs; judges and lawyers occasionally find them oppressive and complain, but have not yet had as much courage as churchmen—they are more bound by precedent. Military and naval officers wear their uniform on actual duty; for relaxation in society they find it a relief to throw off the insignia, and walk about undistinguished. As the mass of society grows, these specialities are absorbed into it. The November pageantry of the Lord of the City is the last of a host of similar things which the value of time and the increase of business and population have made impossible; it is now an exception to the flatness and uniformity of life; it was once only according to rule and wont. But society has got beyond it; and, though "full of state and ancientry," it excites almost as much laughter as admiration. Like "the old courtier's cap," it is "richly suited, but unsuitable"—a thing of cost and display, but speaking of a different era, at once picturesque and incongruous.

But, perhaps, by that very incongruity with all around it, it is the best possible type of the City itself; that mass of old customs, rights, and jurisdictions, that are exceptions to all the rest of the kingdom, that are disliked and suspected by all who do not profit by them, and appear to defy not only the power but almost the knowledge of the Legislature. Everything has changed in the City but its charters, and the determination of the Corporation to maintain them inviolate The old conduits are gone, the old churches have perished, the old gates, the palaces, the very prisons have been swept away; "Flete-strete and ye ward of Chepe" have perished and been renewed; but still the old procession passes yearly along them, bearing the same Civic Magistrate to go through the same forms, to return to the same banquet as gathered the worthy citizens together centuries ago. Is not the whole day and its observances a type of the City itself, clinging almost with fanaticism to what is antiquated, refusing to read the lesson which such awful material agents as time and conflagration has taught it—that change, progress, alteration is inevitable; and, neglecting realities and duties, in the midst of old world pomps and pageantries, which, in some respects, are beginning to be inconveniences? Was there not something even in the progress of last Tuesday suggestive? The Corporation has for centuries possessed more than regal revenues, and yet the Chief Magistrate of the City had to pass, with all his train, through streets, not one of which is either wide or straight enough for the traffic of a third-rate town, to embark from a river-side where there is scarcely one good landing-place for a population of two millions of people, and to float up to Westminster between banks encumbered with obstructions, deformed and disfigured by dirt, filth, and dilapidation. The blame of this cannot be visited on any men or set of men; the system has grown up through centuries, and the abuses have become so gigantic and lucrative, that they are actual powers, both in what they do, and what they neglect to do; so sanctioned by usage, that men who act under them cannot see their evils. Half the charters of the City were exemptions from the general jurisdiction of the realm, purchased from needy monarchs by timely loans, or grants of money; they are called the rights and privileges of the City of London; but is it by any means certain that these privileges were a benefit to the community? Were they not rather advantages gained by the City at the expense of the country at large? Such partial privileges and local advantages were quite in the spirit of a past age; but, never just, they have, in the course of time, become mischievous. They were like the old monopolies the Crown used to grant to individuals, which were, in fact, nothing but licenses to rob the public; the Crown, in accepting the purchase-money from the favoured persons, sharing in the spoil. To exempt any men, or body of men, from laws applied to everybody else, is always rife with danger. Is it certain that the "immunities" of the City of London have been any real benefit to the City itself? What are they? Who enjoys them? What results have they produced? London, as a metropolis, has not a better municipal system of government than many a provincial town; in some respects, the towns that have grown up within a century are better managed than the City, whose charters date from before the Conquest. According as the City proper has diminished in proportion, by the increase of the metropolis around it, its government has become more anomalous and exceptional; when the City was the whole of London, public opinion, and its civic constitution, were, no doubt, in check on maladministration. The heads of the Corporation were the leading men of the time. Now, all this is altered; the City is merely the centre of a vast accumulation, of which it forms but a small fraction. It has ceased to be the Royal residence, the aristocracy have long since left it; the very merchants that give it importance no longer have their dwellings there. It has become the mere office or working premises of a nation, a depôt of goods, and an exchange; business has increased in it, but social life has degenerated. Compare the social state of the City of London now with what it was in the days of Elizabeth, and James, and Charles, or down to a still later period; it is richer, busier, but its offices and its Corporation no longer hold the same place in the social fabric. Then the greatest merchants looked up to the City dignities as places of honour; the same class now shun them with something very like aversion. Who does a Minister of State understand by the term the "City of London," when he expresses himself anxious to secure its support? Not the men who fill its offices, but the Barings and the Jones Loyds, and the men of that stamp. Systems and men react on each other; run over the names of those who are playing a prominent part in public life; there is scarcely one political name among the "City men"—those who hold Corporation dignities. So far are we from the days of the Walworths and the Greshams, that we do not produce even a Beckford; nay, within the present generation, there has been a diminution in the active influence of the City on politics: what is the public estimation of the Court of Aldermen now, for instance, to what it was in the days of Waithman and Wood? It does not contain a man whom the public would miss; and what is more, it has become a term too often the reverse of favourable; obstinate legal resistance to claims morally just, or the expedients of needy men to hold their position do not inspire respect. The world hears and is silent, but it is the carelessness of scorn.

Is it possible that a Corporation, thus weakened in influence, and decayed in that which is the only sure gift of systems—men—can continue in its present anomalous state? All the processions and pageants, and banquets—all the "splendid hospitality" in the world cannot defer the day of reckoning. Those things are good, but they are not all. The constitution of the City will have to be assimilated to modern ideas of election and responsibility. Its separate Boards for such necessary purposes as lighting and paving, often at variance, and always pulling up and laying down at different times, acting without concert or arrangement, must be consolidated. As to the Charities of the City, many things are rumoured which we do not care to repeat; but, for them, too, there will be inquiry. The Revenues of the City are still more open to revision and control. When we look at the state of London, and think of its immense funds, is it possible to avoid a suspicion of mismanagement? It is only with the utmost difficulty the slightest improvement is effected, as to the construction of a new street, it requires discussion for years! Such were not the great municipalities of old; it was not thus the splendid cities of Italy were governed; and nothing but our own tolerance of inaction in whole generations of authorities, has left London the dirty, dingy, undrained, unwholesome district it is, avoided as a residence, with streets that its traffic is outgrowing, and a river degenerating into the repulsive aspect of a large ditch.

MEETING OF PARLIAMENT

Although Parliament will assemble on Thursday, the 18th, the Queen's Speech, as already announced, will not be delivered until Tuesday, the 23rd instant. Her Majesty will not open the new Parliament in person. The first business will be the election of a Speaker to replace the lamented in the re-election of the Right Hon. C Shaw Lefevre, who is respected by all parties.

The liberal members of the House of Commons have received the usual circular from Lord John Russell requesting their attendance at the opening of Parliament on the 18th instant; and Lord Stanley has issued a circular inviting the members of his party to meet at his house on the morning of the 18th, preparatory to the opening of Parliament.

Lord Lansdowne will entertain a party of Peers, supporters of the Government, at Lansdowne House, on the 23rd; and Lord John Russell has issued cards for a full-dress dinner of the members of the House of Commons, who are connected with the Government, on the same evening, at the official residence of the First Lord of the Treasury, in Downing-street, when the Queen's Speech on the opening of Parliament will be submitted to the noblemen and gentlemen assembled.

It is expected that Parliament will sit for about a month, and be adjourned a few days before Christmas.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office, on Wednesday afternoon. The Council was attended by all the Cabinet Ministers in town.

NATIONAL GALLERY.—RESIGNATION OF MR. EASTLAKE.—Mr. Eastlake has resigned the appointment of Keeper of the Pictures in the National Gallery, which he has held since Mr. Seguier's death, and Mr. Uwins, R.A. has been appointed in his stead—the joint offices of Secretary of the Fine Arts Commission and Keeper of the Gallery having materially interfered with Mr Eastlake's labours as an artist. Mr. Uwins's duties appear to consist of the care of the Queen's Pictures since Sir Augustus Callcott's death, so that the two offices, as in Mr. Seguier's case, are again united in the same person.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—The following gentlemen having undergone the necessary examinations for the diploma, were admitted members of the college at the meeting of the Court of Examiners on Friday the 5th inst., viz.: Messrs. MANSION-HOUSE.—The Lord Mayor has fixed twelve o'clock for the hour at which the Court will sit for the present.

COURT OF ALDERMEN.—A Court was held on Monday, immediately before the new Lord Mayor was sworn into office, for the despatch of the last remaining business of the Mayoralty. Alderman Moon, as one of the visiting Magistrates of the gaol of Newgate, presented a communication from Sir George Grey and Whitehall, Nov. 6, 1847, in which the Right Hon. Baronet stated that, under the special circumstances which have occurred in the case of the convict Mary Ann Hunt, her Majesty has been pleased to command that the sentence of death should not be carried into effect. The prisoner will be detained in Newgate until after her expected confinement, when the commuted punishment will be notified. The Sheriffs made the communication to the convict as soon as possible after it reached their hands.

METROPOLITAN IMPROVEMENTS.—On Monday, her Majesty's Commissioners of Woods and Forests lodged notices at Lincoln's-inn-hall of their intention to petition at the ensuing session of Parliament for power to form a new street from the corner of Star and Bell yards with Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields to the new line of Drury-lane, Comprising the houses on the east side of Star and Bell yards, and Carey-street between Star and Bell yards and Chancery-lane, the whole or some portion of Symond's Inn, the west end of Rolls buildings, the west side of Fetter-lane, and both sides of Rolls buildings, Fetter-lane, White's-alley, and part of Bell-yard, and the whole of Acorn-court; and also for power to remove the Colonnade of the Record Street Quadrant.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE

At the Paris Academy of Sciences' sitting of the 2nd inst., a letter was received from M. de Castelnau, containing a catalogue of 947 earthquakes in different parts of America, between 18.0 and 1845. There was also a paper received from M. Siepce de St. Victor, detailing an experiment which he had made photography. He finds that if a sheet of paper, on which there be writing or printed characters or a drawing, be exposed for a few minutes to the vapour of iodine, and there be applied immediately afterwards a coating of starch, moistened by slightly acidulated water, a faithful tracing of the writing, printing, or drawing, will be obtained. It is thus shown that the iodine has the property of fixing itself existing upon the paper, and of rendering it capable of being deposited in the starch. It is observed that a great number of substances, such as nitric acid, phosphoric acid, chlorurets of lime and mercury, &c., act in a similar manner, and that various vapours, particularly those of ammonia, have the effect of vivifying the images which are obtained by photography.

The Débats says it has reason to believe, from information which it has received, that the "Cause des Dupes at Consignations" has come to a decision not to take any part in the new loan.

The Duchess of Valencia, wife of General Narvaez, left Paris on Sunday last, for Madrid.

The Prince de Joinville returned to La Spezzia on the 26th ult., from Leghorn.

SUICIDE OF COUNT BRESSON.—Advices from Paris and Naples bring an account of a fearful tragedy in the latter city—the suicide of Count Bresson, Peer of France, and Ambassador of that country, at Naples (by whom, when Ambassador at Madrid, the Montpensier marriage was brought about.) The unfortunate nobleman was found early on the morning of the 2nd instant bathed in blood, and having his throat cut in his own private apartment of the Embassy. The following particulars of the unhappy occurrence are from the pen of a correspondent at Naples:—"Count Bresson had his formal audience of the King of Naples to present his credentials as Ambassador of France, the day before yesterday (Sunday, 31st ult.); he was graciously received, and retired apparently pleased. Next day he paid a number of visits, and in the evening went to the Opera without evincing throughout the day or evening the slightest symptom of insanity or excitement. On reaching home, however, he was observed to be agitated. His excitement increased, and he continued walking about his apartment until four o'clock, when, suddenly the fall of a heavy body was heard. The Countess Bresson ran to him, and found him lying in a pool of blood, which flowed from a frightful wound in the throat, effected by a razor, which was found close to him. Instant alarm was given, and almost immediately the surgeon of the British Legation arrived, but the Count was already dead, nothing could be done. The Count was said to be in low spirits when he left Paris a short time since to enter upon the discharge of his duties as Ambassador at the Court of Naples. This was attributed to chagrin at the refusal of the King to appoint him to either the British or the Russian embassy. The former he particularly desired. He made his will, and arranged all his affairs before his departure, which occasions a surmise that he contemplated destroying himself. Nevertheless he appeared perfectly collected throughout his journey, and, it was understood, transacted important business at Turin en route. It is, however, believed that the disappointments just alluded to preyed upon his mind, and produced the mental disease which prompted him to the fatal act.

The latest news from Paris announces another extraordinary event scarcely less appalling than the foregoing—the circumstance of its relating also to an Ambassador of France, making it a "strange coincidence" indeed. The Journal des Débats of Tuesday last, thus mentions the matter:—"Count Mortier, Ambassador from the Government of France to the Court of Parma, has been struck with insanity. It was found necessary to place him in a lunatic asylum on Sunday last. On that morning, after having shut himself up with his two children in a room of the apartment he occupied in the Hotel Chaban, he wrote two letters, couched in similar terms, one addressed to his wife, and the other to a friend, in which he apprised them that in a few minutes he and his two children would have ceased to live. The Prefect of Police was informed of the fact. He hastened to the hotel, where he was shortly afterwards joined by the Chancellor, who attended in consequence of Count Mortier being a member of the Chamber of Peers. The Count had barricaded himself in his chamber, armed with a razor, which he brandished over the heads of his children. At intervals he threatened his own life, and in his delirium vociferated the most horrible menaces. It then became necessary to adopt some resolution. The Chancellor spoke to him in a friendly tone of voice. The Count replied by incoherent speeches of death and blood; and then, addressing his son, whom he held on his knee, told the child that he must die. The unhappy child, who is 11 years of age, exclaimed that he did not wish to die, and struggled, weeping all the while. Then, addressing himself to his daughter, a child of eight years of age, the Count asked her if she would allow him to kill her. The poor child, in her turn, said that she would part with her father; and it is added, that the father prepared to execute his horrible design. The persons who heard, outside the door, what was passing within, were paralyzed with terror. Not a word or a movement might precipitate the event which was directed by insanity. This scene lasted nearly three hours. The Countess Mortier, the Chancellor Pasquier, and M. Delessert, the Prefect of Police, remained standing at the door in a state of inexpressible horror. At length, after these long and cruel hours of entreaties, silence, expectation, and negotiation, access was obtained into the apartment by a door which had been some time closed, and which was concealed from the Chancellor and the others. Several persons, at once, rushed in, and succeeded in extricating the trembling children from their agony, and restored them to their mother. Count Mortier still, however, held the razor in his hand, and it was necessary to disarm him to rescue him from the fatal blow. the men did not reply at the call, and it has been ascertained that they left the town in small detached parties, and set off home. These deserters belong to the Bishopric of Bâle.

Hostilities were positively to commence, according to the latest accounts from Berne, on the 8th, and it was not expected that Fribourg, which was already invested on all sides, could resist more than 48 hours. The General in Chief, Dufour, had addressed an order of the day to the troops, encouraging and urging them not only to come out of the struggle victoriously, but to act throughout it with humanity and generosity, and to shut out pillage under their safe keeping the children, women, men, and ministers of religion.

The Zurich Gazette of the 6th inst announces that, on the 4th, the troops of the Canton of Uri had penetrated into the Canton of Tessino, and that, in a skirmish of advanced posts near Airolo, two officers of Uri were killed.

The Cologne Gazette of the 8th instant publishes the following letter, dated Lake of Constance, 3rd instant:—"The Austrian troops have assembled in such numbers on the frontiers of Switzerland, that there are three battalions in the small town of Bregentz alone. These troops are, it is said, provided with all means of transport required for crossing rivers. It is believed from these facts, that Austria will interfere, should circumstances demand the presence of those troops

The road over the Spulgen is stopped, and the mail will no longer pass by it. Convoys of artillery and Congreve rockets are moving towards the Swiss frontier.

The Bâle Gazette of the 6th announces the departure from Zurich of the Russian Ambassador, Baron de Krudener. He called on the burgomaster, M. Zehnder, to inform him that, as civil war was on the point of breaking out, he quitted the Swiss territory by order of the Emperor Considerable interest had been excited in official circles by the announcement that a courier from Lord Palmerston, bearing dispatches for Mr. Peel, had arrived at Berne. It was rumoured that the purport of the dispatch was for Mr. Peel to offer the friendly mediation of England, an offer which, however useful it might have been some time since, is now, it is feared, useless.

GERMANY.

A letter from Darmstadt announces the arrest of a servant of Count Gorlitz, and the late unfortunate Countess, who, it will be remembered, was found burnt to death, and of whose murder the Count was accused. The servant is charged with attempting to poison his master. Some soup served up to the Count's table having a curious odour, it excited suspicion, and on being analysed was found to contain a strong dose of poison. The father of the servant has also been arrested.

AUSTRIA.

Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress left their summer residence on the 28th ult., and are now taking up their abode at Hofburg. On the 11th, they intended going to Presburg, for the opening of the Hungarian Diet, in company with the Archduke the Stadtholder. The Duchess Maria Louisa left on the 6th, and will probably reach Parma about the middle of the month. Count M. Bellegarde arrived here from Carlsbad, by way of Carlsruhe, Stuttgardt, and Munich, on the 30th ult. His circuitous route is said to be in close connexion with the affairs of Switzerland. Everybody here is in a state of expectancy as to what may be the result of measures consequent upon the disorders of that country, which are not likely to be terminated without bloodshed. The state of health in Vienna is by no means satisfactory, although the mortality is not great. The Privy Councillor Weiss von Stackenfels is dangerously ill, and slight hopes are entertained of his recovery.

At Vienna, the rains have been so heavy as to have made the river to overflow its banks, and caused some damage.

The number of strangers who have visited Spa since the commencement of the season to the 1st instant, amounts to 5067. The officer immediately surrendered himself, but refused to give up the names of the persons who acted as seconds.

HOLLAND.

Some time ago, the father of a family of seven children made a claim on the Dutch Government for the support of the seventh one, grounding his pretensions on the Imperial law of the 20th Nivose, An XIII, which was passed during the occupation of Holland by the French. The claim was resisted on the plea that the law in question was an obsolete or a repeal ed one. The claimant, however, only urged his claim the more vehemently, and an action was accordingly brought against the Government, of which the final upshot was, that the decision was referred to be legal. Immediately after the publication of this important decision, a host of fathers forwarded similar claims to the Government on behalf of each of their respective seventh child The majority of these claims were admitted, and the Government has laid before the States-General a bill for raising 70,000 florins for carrying into effect the provisions of the Imperial law in question, and for paying the expenses (35,000 florins) of the law-suit referred to THAMES.

REVERSE OF FORTUNE.—On Tuesday a middle-aged man, of highly-respectable appearance, named John Berwick Whitby, and who, it was stated, was formerly one of the largest woollen-manufacturers in Bradford, Yorkshire, was charged with stealing 12lb. of wool, the property of the St. Katharine Dock Company. It appeared that the prisoner had been reduced from a state of comparative opulence to one of the greatest and most necessitous indigence. He had become bankrupt, his mills and other buildings were sold off, and he came to London with the wreck of his fortune to commence afresh, but ill-fortune still pursued him, and he lost about £1600 by a recent woollen transaction, which completely ruined him. Under these circumstances, being well known in the woollen trade, he picked up a scanty livelihood by occasionally purchasing wool for different individuals, and in this capacity was constantly in and out of the wool warehouse of the St. Katharine Docks. It seemed that on some of these occasions Mr. Broadway, the deputy storekeeper of the warehouse, observed the prisoner put some small quantities of wool in his pocket. He accordingly on Monday directed Worsley, one of the dock constables, to stop Mr. Whitby as he came out of the dock in the afternoon and search him. This was done, and the prisoner having been taken to the lodge and searched, 2½lb. of wool was taken from him, part from his coat-pocket and part from his hat. He had no pass for this quantity, which he would have had if he had been properly possessed of it. From subsequent information, police-constable H. 37, proceeded to No. 4, Harrod's-place, Wellclose-square, in the corner of a room which the prisoner had rented, he found about one pound of wool.

John Passmore Mumford, the superintendent of the St. Katharine's Dock police, said, he had reason to believe it was extreme destitution that had led the prisoner to act as he had done. The company would be satisfied if the case ended with summarily. A number of highly-respectable gentlemen attended, and spoke of the prisoner's previous character in the highest terms. They considered him the victim of misfortune having Whitby was extremely sorry to see a man who had formerly filled a respectable station in society in such a position; but, notwithstanding what had been said in court, he felt that he could not do less than commit the prisoner to take his trial for the felony.—The several witnesses were bound over to prosecute.

DR. BOWRING, M.P., AND HIS BROTHER PLENIPOTENTIARY OF TWO HIGHWAYMEN.—On Friday morning se'nnight, Dr. Bowring, M.P., and his brother, who is the chief manager of the Llynvi Iron Works, at Maesteg, proceeded from that place to Bridgend, to procure from the company's bankers money to pay the workmen at the iron works their wages. The cheque was for £1000, and they received for the same £600 in sovereigns, £340 in silver, and £260 in bank notes. These were in separate bags, and placed in a large one, the whole contained in a case underneath the seat-box of the gig in which the gentlemen travelled. At twelve o'clock they started on their return, Maesteg being ten miles distant from Bridgend, and had reached about midway, when they were met by two men, who stopped the horse, and, with a loaded pistol in each hand, demanded "money or their lives." Resistance was useless, and the money was given up. The robbers shot the horse before leaving. Mr. Charles Bowring returned to Bridgend, and gave information of the robbery to the authorities, who immediately despatched officers in all directions in pursuit. Both the robbers were, on Saturday, apprehended, and the £600 in gold found on their persons. The names of the robbers are Richard Maddocy and John Lloyd. They were formerly employed at the Llinfi Iron Works, of which Mr. C. Bowring is the Resident Director. In addition to the gold already recovered, there have also been found notes to the amount of £170 in the Cwm Hantywyn Wood. Both the prisoners have been committed for trial at the ensuing assizes.

FRONT OF A HOUSE CARRIED AWAY BY A CARAVAN.—About a quarter before nine o'clock, on Monday morning, as the vehicles used to convey the articles that form the Chinese Exhibition from Fairfield, Bow, en route for Birmingham, entered Leadenhall-street, one of the caravans, which was heavily laden, with a greater breadth at top than at bottom, drove up close to the curb, when, on coming opposite to No. 70, which is in the occupation of Mr Cockburn, toyman, the front of whose house is one of the old projecting ones, extending 4 feet 7 inches beyond the line of houses, the heavy packed load came against the projecting front. The caravan, not being aware of the danger, and having a powerful team, whipped his horses, which made them go forward, when a terrific crash was heard, and in an instant the projecting portion came down. The police constable on duty was knocked down by some of the falling timbers, but sustained no serious injuries

FATAL ACCIDENT FROM FIRE-ARMS. On Friday evening, a young gentleman named Thomas Tullett, 14 years of age, met a dreadful death at Berkeley-hill, Tuxteth-park, Liverpool, where some boys were firing cannon. One piece, which was loaded with two slugs, about an inch long, had lain on the ground for some time, but, on its not igniting, they threw it into a bonfire, and soon after it went off, when one of the slugs struck the deceased, who was passing at the time, on the left temple, perforated the brain, and went entirely through the head to the right temple. He was taken to the Southern Hospital, where he lingered about three hours. LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

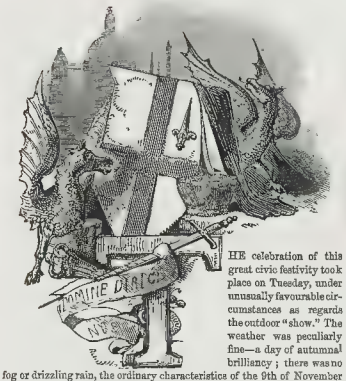
BRINGING THE BARON OF BEEF INTO GUILDHALL.



THE celebration of this great civic festivity took place on Tuesday, under unusually favourable circumstances as regards the outdoor "show." The weather was peculiarly fine—a day of autumnal brilliancy; there was no fog or drizzling rain, the ordinary characteristics of the 9th of November in London; neither was there a nipping air to chill the admiration of the spectators, but it was mild and sunny; though, haply, some far-seeing folks might affect to foreshadow in the bright mid-day beams the waning of the last of the City pageants.

Soon after eleven o'clock, the City authorities assembled at the Guildhall. The Lord Mayor and the Sheriffs received the Aldermen and principal officers in the Council Chamber, where they sat down to a splendid breakfast. Shortly after twelve o'clock, it was announced that all was in readiness to depart for Westminster, and the pageant began to move in the following

CARVING. "THE BARON."

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

Thames-street, Earl-street, and Chatham-place, to Blackfriars-bridge. By adopting this route, the Lord Mayor passed through his own ward, Queenhithe. His Lordship was exceedingly well received throughout the whole line, but in the old place of Queenhithe, where the Lord Mayor's residence is situated, a great number of his personal and private friends had assembled, and the reception was very enthusiastic. The Procession, in compliment, halted for a few moments at "the hithe," at which among the ladies who enjoyed the scene from the windows of his Lordship's house, were two of his fair daughters.

THE PRESENTATION AT WESTMINSTER.

On arriving at Blackfriars-bridge, the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, &c., "took water" in their state barges, and, with a favourable tide, proceeded without interruption to Westminster. The several bridges, and the banks of the river, were crowded with spectators; and the firing of guns and other salutes were frequent and enthusiastic. The civic party landed at a temporary pier within the precincts of the new Houses of Parliament; and, having formed in procession, the Lord Mayor, with the Sheriffs, accompanied by his brother Aldermen, including the late Lord Mayor, advanced to the Court of Exchequer, and were introduced to the learned Barons by the Recorder (Mr. Law, M.P.), in the following terms:—

My Lord—I have the honour to present to your Lordship and the Barons of this court the Right Hon. John Kinnersley Hooper, chosen by the citizens of London to fill the office of Lord Mayor for the ensuing year. The election of our chief magistrate, conducted through all its stages in strict accordance with the laws, charters, and custom of the city, has been notified in the prescribed form to the first law officer of the Crown, and has received, through the Lord Chancellor, her Majesty's most gracious approbation. A perfect unanimity has prevailed on this occasion in the distinct branches of the Corporation concerned in the election of Lord Mayor. The general concurrence in designating Mr. Hooper for this high station may be attributed in no mean degree to the personal qualities and character of this gentleman; to the respect borne to the position formerly occupied by his father and his grandfather in the mercantile world (in the same branch of business—the foreign wine trade), and to the unblemished reputation acquired and transmitted by them, and sustained by him, through a long, successful, and honourable career. The attention of our municipal body is naturally attracted by these qualities and by these pursuits. Mr. Hooper has been successively chosen a Common Councilman, a Deputy and A derman of his ward (the ward of Quecnhithe), where he has continually resided for 25 years. In 1842 he served the office of Sheriff with the entire approbation of the Liverymen of London, in which popular body and branch of the Corporation the right of election to that office is vested. Accessible, diligent, and judicious—of an even temper and blameless deportment in the concerns of public and private life—Mr. Hooper has conciliated, in every sphere of usefulness, the respect and regard of his friends and fellow-citizens. If yet higher qualities and more exalted faculties be deemed essential attributes of the Chief Magistrate, these also, we confidently trust, will be found to be associated with the virtues I have ventured to enumerate. Mr. Hooper has the benefit of a large experience in each important grade of public trust and civic employment. He is familiar with the functions of a Magistrate, with the enlightened administration of impartial justice (administered by the Judges of the land); he is conversant with the peculiar rights and privileges of his fellow-citizens, of which he is now constituted the especial guardian; he has been united by the strongest bonds—by a reciprocity of benefits received, of duties performed, of mutual gratitude and esteem at every step of his advancement with each distinct branch of our municipal Corporation. In loyalty to his Sovereign, and in obedience to the laws, he will (himself a future example to others) continue to tread in the steps of those who have best deserved the commendation of the Crown, and the gratitude of their fellow-citizens. Conspicuous amidst this class of Mr. Hooper's more eminent predecessors may be recorded the name of Sir G. Carrol, the late Lord Mayor. If the sterling qualities of firm and upright men are tested on occasions of difficulty and embarrassment, and on emergencies and collisions no foresight nor prudence could avert, the Mayoralty of Sir G. Carrol will be long remembered with respect and approbation by every citizen capable of forming a correct judgment, and desirous of forming that judgment aright. It has been truly said, "the machine of a free constitution is no simple thing, but as intricate as it is valuable." This is essentially true of the municipal government of our ancient city, and of those institutions, which, founded on our Saxon liberties, and advancing with the growth of the British Constitution, and coming to be regarded as parcel of the great commonwealth of the empire, have happily survived the decay of every other municipal Corporation in the United Kingdom. It has been the aim and object of Sir George Carrol to preserve to every branch of the great Corporation of which he was the head, the separate rights and privileges our Constitution has assigned to each; and he had hoped, by a judicious handling, to promote the harmonious working of a delicate machine, comprehending in its frame and structure the action of distinct elements and of nicely balanced powers. In using these laudable endeavours, he has avoided dangerous extremes, his conduct has been equally removed from servile compliance with a party, and the vain pursuit of a wild popularity. In cases of apprehended difficulty, he has sought and he has acted upon the opinion of the legal advisers of the Corporation; and, having drawn his own conclusions after much deliberation, he has felt (to employ the language of a great statesman) "his unbiassed opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to any man, or to any set of men living; they were a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he would be deeply answerable." Acting upon these principles, Sir G. Carroll has studied to preserve in their integrity our mixed Government and municipal constitution, and, by securing to every individual the just legal rights of the citizen, to reconcile and advance the common interest of the whole. He lays down the robe of office unsullied, and whoever shall hereafter succeed him, will derogate nothing from the fair dignity, and give an earnest of future fame and excellency, in proposing the late Lord Mayor as a model of conduct in a public station.

The Lord Chief Baron then addressed a few words of congratulation to the new dignitary; the usual oaths of office were then administered to the Lord Mayor by the Queen's Remembrancer; and the late Lord Mayor having handed in his accounts, the Recorder, in the name of the Lord Mayor and Sheriffs, invited the Lord Chief Baron and his learned brethren to the Banquet at Guildhall. The Lord Mayor, attended as before, then left the court, and proceeded, in succession, to the Court of Queen's Bench, the Court of Common Pleas, and the Courts of the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, the Vice-Chancellor of England, and those of the two Vice-Chancellors, where the invitation to the Banquet was repeated. This concluded, the civic authorities re-embarked. Meanwhile, the barge of the Stationers Company crossed the river to Lambeth Palace, and received from the household of the Archbishop of Canterbury, certain hot spiced ale, buns, and cakes, and a quantity of wine, on payment of the customary fees. We described this episode in the spectacle of the day in the No. of our Journal for November 15, 1845.

RETURN OF THE PROCESSION.

At three o'clock, the Water Procession left Westminster, and returned to Blackfriars Bridge; where it was joined by the Lady Mayoress, in her state carriage, drawn by six horses. This was a splendid equipage: the carriage is of graceful build; the colour of the body dark purple, not overloaded with emblazonry, and the roof surmounted by a very elegant gilt gallery rail, or trellis, after the admired taste of Marshal Soult's state coach, in the Coronation procession of Queen Victoria. The Lord Mayor's livery is blue and dark crimson and gold lace; with the novel introduction of the crest in the hat-loops.

The Procession was well received throughout the line of streets—New Bridge-street, Ludgate-hill, Ludgate-street, St. Paul's Churchyard, Cheapside, and King-street, to the Guildhall. The Lord Mayor was cheered repeatedly, as was also the late Lord Mayor, (Sir George

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE JOHN KINNERSLEY HOOPER, LORD MAYOR.

Carroll,) whose firm and dignified, yet humane and temperate, discharge of the duties of his office, has rendered him deservedly popular.

The shops in the route were half closed, the streets were filled with spectators; in short, we do not remember a so full attendance since the Royal Visit. Among the novel features of the pageant, were half a hundred of the old tars of Greenwich, each of whom, in his characteristic costume, carried a tin shield and baton; these worthies marched two and two in front of the fishmonger Sheriff (Hill), as indicative of his civic association with the sea. The Vintners' Company (the Lord Mayor's) also came out in strong relief; the Swan Upper, Swan Marker, Master Wine Porters, the Swan flag, and other banners, forming a very characteristic display. The show of ribbon cockades was likewise greater than usual: the bright armour reflected the broad sunbeams with rich effect; and the massive appearance of the household and other troops gave a solidity to the pageant which some of its mimic features lacked.

As we have said, this is "the last of the City Pageants!"—a state denoted by the great "golden glister" of a coach which demands some repair besides external gilding. However, there is antique worth in tarnish, just as ermine is prized for its ancestral yellow.

The procession reached the Guildhall shortly after four o'clock, and was received with the chivalric honour of the sound of trumpet, and loud cheering.

THE GUILDHALL.

This noble banqueting-room was superbly fitted up for the great festal event of the day. From the gallery round the Hall were suspended richly-emblazoned flags; there were, likewise, colours grouped upon the walls; and a group of armour, colours, and military devices in the great east window, immediately above the inscription "God save the Queen," in gold letters. In the midst of the ordinance group was placed, in honour of the birthday of the Prince of Wales, a magnificent plume of feathers, with the usual appendage of a Royal coronet, and the motto, "Ich Dien." This novel emblem measures nine feet in height; the stem of the feathers is of gilt metal but the feathery portion is entirely of spun glass, of silky lustre and dazzling whiteness; and, being placed over a strong gas-light, had a most striking effect. It was entirely designed by Mr. Bunning, the City Clerk of the Works, and executed under his immediate superintendence by Mr. Martin, of the house of the late Mr. Collins, of the Strand. It is altogether an object of great beauty and skill as a specimen of art, and elicited the most marked admiration throughout the Hall during the evening. As a matter of curiosity, it may be added that the combined length of the several fibres of glass employed in the construction of this interesting ornament is equal to 50,000 miles. This singular adaptation of glass is stated to be the first known instance of the kind. Its resemblance to the ostrich feather is very perfect.

In the great west window was displayed the Star of the Order of the Garter, composed of brilliant glass drops, lighted behind with gas: this has always been an object of great attraction.

The Hall was otherwise lighted by jets of gas, following the main architectural lines; and, from the roof were suspended the two gorgeous chandeliers, which were manufactured for the occasion of the banquet to her Majesty the Queen, in 1837. These chandeliers are nearly of semi-globular form, and each measures 40 feet in circumference; the gas-lights are round the circle, and the portion beneath (corresponding with the glass pan of a sinumbra lamp) is formed of sections diverging from a centre, alternately prisms of glass, and panels painted with the Royal arms and initials, and national emblems. These chandeliers had not, we believe, been used since 1837: they are magnificent, but heavy in effect.

The galleries over the two principal doorways were occupied by an instrumental band, and a corps of vocalists.

The arrangement of the tables was, as heretofore; and, not the least striking features were the Barons of Beef, raised upon pedestals draped with crimson. We have engraved one of them.

Advancing from the Hall, up the steps, we found the Exchequer Court fitted up as a dining-room for such guests as were not fortunate enough to have seats allotted to them in the Guildhall. The Court was brilliantly lighted, and was hung with a number of large and fine paintings; including the one recently presented to the Corporation by the King of the French, depicting the presentation of the City address to his Majesty, at Windsor, on the occasion of his visit to this country, in 1844. This picture, which contains the portraits of most of the leading Civic functionaries, was an object of much interest.

The corridor leading to the Council Chamber was flanked with a profusion of greenhouse plants. The Council Chamber, with its very interesting collection of paintings and sculpture, was, as usual, appropriated for the presentation of the guests to the Lady Mayoress and the Lord Mayor, prior to the banquet. Though an apartment of little architectural or decorative character, it had a very gay appearance.

From the upper end of this room, the visitors passed by a small anteroom into the Court of Aldermen's chamber, which was used as a drawing-room. It has an enriched gold and coloured ceiling, and is sumptuously furnished; and possesses an historical interest in being a relic of the Great Fire in 1666. The novelties here were of a very artistic character. Through openings made by the removal of two large windows at the upper end, the company looked out upon a model scene of the forge and gallery of Gondo, with the waterfall of the Frasmodi, on the Italian side of the Simplon, about four leagues from Domo D'Ossola. It was lighted with gas, and the effect of the real water, and living vegetation, very cleverly intermingled with the painted set scene. It could, also, be viewed from an outer gallery, when the illusion was much increased by looking over a ragged slope into the deep valley below. The idea originated with Mr. Bunning, and has been ably executed by Mr. F. Fenton. The other novelty was a large conservatory, into which the company looked from the Aldermen's Room; an improvement of last year. Here was a large painting of Henry VIII. and his retinue embarking from the Tower; including a view of old London Bridge and St. Paul's Cathedral. A fountain of water was constantly playing, and the effect of this and the other picture was improved by illumination, and a delightful relief from the heat and glare of the gas-lit rooms.

It is intended by the Corporation to allow all these splendid decorations (including the plume of feathers, the Alpine scene, and the conservatory) to remain up for use at the approaching Polish Ball, which will take place on the 17th instant, with surpassing magnificence.

The Hall was opened to the guests at half-past three o'clock, and many of those who had not joined in the procession to Westminster made their appearance at that early hour. But it was the return of the Procession that brought the crush, and, from the arrival of the first carriage of the cortège until the hour of dinner, the announcement of guests, and the musical salutes which greeted the more important of them, were incessant. Lord John Russell arrived shortly before half-past six, and was received with the most enthusiastic greetings. The other Members for the City of London, Sir G. Grey, the Earl of Auckland, and Lord Denman, were also cordially welcomed.

THE BANQUET.

Soon after half-past six o'clock, the procession of the most distin guished personages left the Council Chamber, and, preceded by the state trumpeters blowing the flourish of welcome, entered the Hall; and, having passed round the vast room amidst very general applause, proceeded to their places at the chief table.

The Right Hon the Lord Mayor presided. On his right were seated the late Lord Mayor, the French Ambassador, Lord John Russell, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Campbell, Right Hon Sir G. Grey, Right Hon. Fox Maule, Mr Sheriff Gunn and Lady, the Right Hon. [illegible] Milner Gibson; the Prussian, American, Dutch, [illegible] Sardinian Ministers; the Hon. Sir [illegible] Cust, Co[illegible]ix Cotts, Admiral Dundas, M.P.; Admiral Dun[illegible] Mr. [illegible], M.P.; Sir C. G. Young (Garter); Mr. [illegible], M.P.; Mr. H. G Ward, Mr. B. Hawes, Mr. [illegible]ough. On the left of the Lord Mayor sat the Lady Mayoress, [illegible] Magnus, Lord Denman, Lord Chief Justice Wilde, the Lord Chancellor, [illegible]aron Rolfe, Mr Sheriff Hill and lady, Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Baron Platt, Mr. [illegible]ustice Williams, the Attorney General, Mr Serjeant Channell, Mr. Serjeant Oliver, Mr. Serjeant Thompson, Mr. Serjeant Cockwell Jones, Lord Dudley Stuart, Right Hon. W. Bingham Baring; Mr. James Pattison, M.P.; Baron Rothschild, M.P., Mr. John Masterman, M.P.; Mr. Lloyd Vaughan Watkins, M.P.; Mr. John Wilson, M.P.; Mr. John Young, M.P.; Mr. [illegible] Coles, M.P.; Mr. S M Peto, M.P. Among the other company were—Sir Moses Montefiore; Mr. C. Pearson, M.P.; Mr. Chapman, M.P.; Mr. James Morris, Governor of the Bank of England; Mr. H. J. Prescott, Deputy-Governor of the Bank of England; Lieut. General Sir James Law Lushington, G.C.B., Deputy Chairman of the East India Company; Mr. James Brooke, Rajah of Sarawak. The following gentlemen were present:—Sir C. Hotham Bart.; Lucas, Sir P. Laurie, Sir Brother, Kelly, Wilson, Humphery, Gibbs, Johnson, Sir James Duke, Farncombe, Musgrove, William Hunter, Challis, Hughes Hughes, Sidney, Moon.

The Hall was crowded with guests, and had a most magnificent appearance. There was an unusual number of ladies present, who were most superbly dressed. The display of diamonds, point lace, and flowers, embroidery, velvet and satin, was very profuse. The variety of the gentlemen's costumes was also very striking; the richly-embroidered uniforms of the Ministers and Foreign Ambassadors, the Deputy-Lieutenants, and the officers of the army and navy, and the Judges in their red robes, had a brilliant effect. The several Aldermen, too, were costly court suits under their scarlet gowns.

The Dinner was provided by Messrs. Younghusband and Son, of Gerrard's-Hall, Basing-lane. It was admirably served, and of excellent quality: the turtle and pines were in profusion. The following is the General Bill of Fare:—

250 tureens of real turtle, containing five pints each, 200 bottles of sherbet, 6 dishes of fish, 30 entrées, 4 boiled rounds of beef, 4 boiled rounds of mutton, 4 boiled turkeys, 46 dishes of capons, 6 dishes of Captain White's salmi's true India curry, 6 French pies, 60 plain pies, 83 hams ornamented, 43 tongues, 2 quarters of [illegible] lamb, 2 barons of beef, 2 rounds of beef, 2 stewed rumps of beef, 13 sirloins, rumps, and ribs of beef; 6 dishes of asparagus, 60 dishes of mashed and other potatoes, 14 dishes of shell-fish, 4 dishes of prawns, 140 jellies, 50 blancmanges, 40 dishes of tarts cream, 40 dishes of almond pastry, 30 dishes of orange and other tourtes, 20 Chantilly baskets, 60 dishes of mince pies, and 86 [illegible]. The Dessert: 80 [illegible] baskets, 6 [illegible], 80 pheasants, 24 grouse, 60 dishes of partridges, 6 dishes of wild fowl, and 2 peafowls. Dessert: 100 pine-apples, [illegible] each; 200 dishes of hot-house grapes, 200 ice creams, 80 dishes of apples, 100 dishes of pears, 60 ornamented Savoy cakes, 70 plates of walnuts, 80 dishes of dried fruits and preserves, 60 dishes of preserved ginger, 60 dishes of roast cakes and chips, and 45 dishes of brandied cherries. Wines: Champagne, Port, Claret, Madeira, port, and sherry.

The table had a most sumptuous appearance. The costly gold and silver services of the upper table were very superb; the pièce montées throughout the Hall were [illegible] made; there were no towers of confectionary, but the tureens, most elaborately chased.

Grace was said before dinner by the Lord Mayor's Chaplain.

The annexed report of the proceedings is from the Times.

The cloth having been removed, and "Rule Britannia,"

The Lord Mayor rose to give the first toast, "The health of her Majesty the Queen," which, after a long, a happy, and a glorious reign. (Drunk with all the honours due to it, and followed by the National Anthem.)

The Lord Mayor, in proposing the next toast, said, he had great pleasure in giving "The health of her Majesty the Queen Dowager," with sincere wishes that she might return to this country with renewed health, after her sojourn abroad. (Loud cheers, followed by a glee.)

The Lord Mayor said, the next toast was, "The health of his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and the Prince of Wales, and the remaining branches of the Royal Family." That day was not only dear to those he addressed, as [illegible] London, in connection with one of their most cherished privileges—the election of a new Sovereign—but it was also memorable as the birthday of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales (Cheers.) He was sure they all entertained towards his Royal Highness every feeling of attachment. (Cheers.) He hoped he [illegible] in wisdom, and ultimately [illegible] to the crown. (Loud cheers.)

[illegible] was, "The City of London and its Trade." (Loud cheers.)

The Lord Mayor had great pleasure in next proposing "The Navy and Army." Although living in times of peace, while he hoped would long continue, for it was a blessing to be enjoyed, they must not forget the glorious deeds which [illegible] rendered in times past, and which always ought to excite the grateful recollect ns of the country. He had great pile sure in associating with the Navy the name of the Earl of Auckland who then presided, and who filled the honourable post of First Lord of the Admiralty, and whose name, he was sure, would be well received in every assembly of Englishmen. He meant the Earl of Auckland. (Cheers.) He hoped he should not dishonour the name of Sir E. Cust. He was quite sure, if either of the services were again wanted, their achievements would equal anything accomplished in former times. (Cheers.)

The Earl of Auckland most warmly acknowledged the compliment.

The Lord Mayor next proposed "The health of the late Lord Mayor." He had great gratification in stating, that the Lordship had gone through his year of office in a manner calculated to call forth the concurrence and approval of his brother magistrates. (Cheers.) Considering the great number of cases which had come under his notice as chief magistrate, he could appeal with confidence to those who had observed his conduct during many years, whether the late Lord Mayor had [illegible] duties, whether he had not uniformly acquitted himself in a manner to entitle him to the high commendation of his fellow citizens. (Cheers.) Go fed by a strong, honest, and upright desire to do what he considered best, it [illegible] on his mind he now retired from office with the consciousness [illegible] faithfully, conscientiously, [illegible] (Cheers.)

[illegible] gratify a compliment. A public man in retiring from office than the tribute he had just received of approbation from his fellow citizens and brother magistrates. He had endeavoured to do his duty faithfully and impartially, and their public approval had [illegible] him. (Cheers.)

The Lord Mayor, in proposing the next toast, said they were honoured with the presence of several Ambassadors representing foreign Princes. It was gratifying to him to see so many of them present on that occasion, as a proof of their friendly intercourse, etc. It was a sure proof that we were on relations of amity and in bonds of peace with the nations of Europe and America. He earnestly [illegible] for peace, its blessings during many years. They were now honoured [illegible] the presence of his Excellency the French Ambassador. (Cheers.) He very well knew it was sure, reasons that nothing should occur to disturb the good feeling and harmony which happily existed at the present period, between this country and that great nation whose representative sat immediately on his right. (Cheers.) They all felt it was essential, in the peace of Europe and of the world, that the [illegible] Britain and France should be united together in the firm bonds of peace and amity. That this might last for many years to come was his most sincere and anxious wish. He had great pleasure in connecting with the toast of the "Foreign Ambassadors" "The health of his Excellency the French Minister." (Loud cheers.)

M. Duc de Broglie.—J'ai regret, en plaidant le mes confus, de n'oser répondre à votre noble et bienveillant appel dans une langue qui m'est étrangère. J'en ai regret surtout pour le corps auquel j'appartiens; il aurait pu mettre une autre interprète. Les vœux que nous formons, en effet, les sont mens qui nous animent, nous venons d'en exprimer un [illegible] devant toute l'Angleterre en présence de cette immense cité, à-fait le cœur de ce vaste empire. Nos vœux sont ceux que forment pour [illegible] propres enfans. Grâce à Dieu, nous ne vivons plus dans ces temps d'orages et de rivalité d'intérêts, où les nations se croyaient ennemies parce qu'elles étaient différentes, où les nations se croyaient ennemies parce qu'elles étaient différentes, où les nations se croyaient ennemies parce qu'elles étaient différentes. THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY NOVEMBER 13, 1847.

THE completion of the Continental lines of railroad will give rise to a new kind of diplomacy. When we hear of some portion of a line being opened which supplies a link wanting to a long chain of communication, we naturally expect that every possible advantage that can be derived from that opening will follow. But this is by no means the case; it is only then that difficulties hitherto unthought of begin to appear.

The German railroads run through some forty or fifty different States; where the Governments have constructed the lines, they keep the management of them; and our experience of the Continental lines does not convince us that Government management is the best. In Germany, especially, the besetting sins of their Governments—timidity, slowness, and too much minuteness of regulation—are everywhere evinced. The rate of speed (if the word can be used at all) is miserably low; it sometimes destroys the distinction between the rail and the old road, leaving it doubtful why the latter was abandoned. But the fact of many Governments, having a control over some portions of the line, creates difficulties of another kind; the service of the post, for instance, instead of being improved by the successive openings of new lines, is hardly bene fited at all; cases have been stated, indeed, where mails are longer in arriving now that they are, or ought to be, conveyed with greater speed. A line of railway is now open continuously from Cologne, through Brussels to Hamburg; yet the mails only gain two hours over the old diligence system on the whole of that distance! The reason is said to be this; when the bags arrive at Hanover, they are stopped for twelve hours, till the old slow-going Post-Office authorities please, in due course, to attend to them. This is a specimen of the obstacles that the new system meets wherever a line crosses from a State where the Government may be tolerably wise and intelligent, into another State where it is intolerably prejudiced against all progress, like the Government of Hanover. Here is the field for a diplomacy quite as useful to the world as that which negotiates Royal marriages. If railways are to be of any benefit to Europe, the absurdities of one State must not be allowed to clog the traffic on a line which may extend over half the Continent. Inaction on a space of ten miles on a line is as fatal to the communication as if it extended over five hundred, and a small State may convert itself into a very great nuisance—not without some pride, perhaps, in the feeling that it can make itself of some importance even in that manner. But we apprehend the world will not stand still quite as readily as they expect. Already, a sense of the inconveniences arising from the patchwork management of the German lines has caused a general meeting of deputies from the different Railway Companies to be summoned; it will meet in Hamburg on the 20th of this month. With its characteristic obstinacy Hanover has refused to send a deputy to this meeting of practical men. The Hanoverian portion of the line "forms the indispensable link between the Eastern and Western States of the German Continent." Hanover will merely delay, not prevent, an improvement; when all the other States have come to an agreement it will have to give a sullen assent; why not, in so simple a thing, go along with the age? We want some better arrangements, too, between this country and France and Belgium; neither country derives half the advantage from railway communication it might do. Both the English and French Post-offices require improvement to bring them up to the level of the time and the wants of the community. But in Germany the state of things is immeasurably worse.

Since the above was written, we are glad to see that new Postal arrangements between France and England are about to be definitively settled. They will establish two departures per day from Paris; one will leave at seven o'clock A.M., with the morning papers, to arrive in London at six in the evening; the second leaves Paris at six P.M. to arrive in London at six the following morning. The new regulations will be carried into effect as soon as the railroad is opened to Nesle, six miles from Boulogne.

WARS for a disputed boundary are essentially wars of barbarism; in case of dispute, the facts are seldom so complicated but that, with a little mutual concession, the controversy can be settled amicably. Wars of conquest are of another kind; they assume no disguise; they are merely the aggression of the strong on the weak without an attempt at justification. The American war with Mexico was begun to assert a right to a disputed frontier; but it was merely the colourable excuse for a war of conquest, which is peculiar, we fear, to no era. The Savage covets the hunting-grounds of a neighbouring tribe; and America has an eye on the mines of Mexico. It is in the New World as in the Old; when the strong power desires to possess the smaller state, she takes it; the polical constitution of Europe renders the process now rather more difficult than of yore; yet, the "annexation" of Cracow is scarcely a year old.

There are proofs enough in the negotiations between the Mexican and the American Commissioners to show that the latter were hardly sincere in their desire for peace. For moderation and sound common sense, we have rarely seen anything in a State paper better than the concluding paragraph of the last letter of the Mexican Commissioners to Mr. Trist:—"The good and salutary work of peace cannot, in our judgment, be brought to a happy conclusion unless each of the contending parties resolves to abandon some of its original pretensions. This has always happened, and every nation has not hesitated, in similar cases, to make great sacrifices to appease the desolating flame of war. Mexico and the United States have particular reasons to act thus. It is not without shame that we are obliged to confess that we are giving to the world the scandal of two Christian nations, of two republics, in the sight of all the monarchies, who are mutually doing to each other all the evil in their power for disputes on limits, when we have more land than is necessary to populate and cultivate in the beautiful hemisphere in which Providence first made us see the light."

If reason governed the world, as many persons very erroneously suppose it does, the spectacle of two nations, neither of which is one-third peopled, fighting about waste territory, that neither of them can want for centuries to come, would be impossible.

RETURN OF LORD HARDINGE.—Her Majesty's steam-frigate Sidon, Captain W. H. Henderson, C.B., which conveys the Earl of Dalhousie, the newly-appointed Governor-General and suite, to Alexandria, en route to Calcutta, is to be at Alexandria by the 4th of December, in readiness to embark the present Governor-General of India, Lord Hardinge, G.C.B. and suite, en route for England from Calcutta, and to convey his Lordship to Marseilles or Portsmouth, as he may desire. The steamer conveys a package containing Bohemian glass manufactures to the Maharajah of Nepaul—a present from Lord Elphinstone.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK filled the see for a period of 20 years. The following prelates, however, retained possession for longer periods, viz—Wilferus, 854 to 906, 46 years. Walter de Grey, 1216 to 1256, 40 years

THE 30th of October, being the anniversary of the day on which Luther nailed his 95 articles on the church-door of Wittenberg (1517), and which was the first great step to the Reformation, has just been solemnised at Weimar—an interesting fact at the present moment, when a second reformation has sprung up in the bosom of the German Evangelical Church, the end of which cannot be foreseen.

POSTSCRIPT.

WE understand that Lord Seymour will propose the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre as Speaker of the House of Commons, and that Mr. John Abel Smith will second the motion.

H. Henderson, C.B., for Alexandria, en route overland to the seat of his government. The distinguished party comprised the Earl and Countess Dalhousie, the Marchioness of Douro, the Right Hon. Fox Maule (Secretary at War), Captain O'Brien (formerly of the Board of Trade), Mr. Watson, Mr. Laurentz Campbell (Secretary of the South-Western Railway Company), who also served with Lord Dalhousie in the Board of Trade, &c. Lord and Lady George Lennox, Captain Yates, Miss Fitzroy, and Mr. Cochrane, R.N., the Commander-in Chief's Flag-Lieutenant, received the Governor-General and suite on their arrival at the Gosport station, and ushered them into the Clarence yard, where Rear-Admiral Superintendent Shirreff, Captain Superintendent Sir W. E. Parry, and Captain Bruce, of her Majesty's ship Trafalgar, (who goes out in the Sidon to take the command of that ship), were in waiting to escort them to the Commander-in-Chief's barge, in which having immediately embarked, they were put on board the Lapwing steam-tender, which conveyed them out to Spithead, where the Sidon lay with steam up and all ready. Captain Henderson received his distinguished guests under a salute of 17 guns and manned yards, and at three, P.M., left the anchorage for Alexandria.

The musical reviewer of the Prussian Universal Gazette of Monday, which reached us yesterday, states that the following last works have been added to the world by the lamented composer:—Six songs for a soprano voice, and three motetts for mixed choruses, which were already in the press. The first act of his first opera, "Lorely," besides a large portion of his new oratorio of "Christ," are also left in his writing-desk; the former in a complete state.

PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS.—This society have deposited two powerful levers at the Southwark side of London-bridge, for the gratuitous use of carmen whose shaft-horses may fall down in descending the dangerous declivity from Tooley-street to Wellington-street, to raise the load from off the poor animals, and enable them to rise.

ROYAL ARSENAL, WOOLWICH. Such is the demand for military stores in consequence of the vast increase of guns and carriages required for the coast defences, and the advanced ships, preparing for commission, that orders have been received for the entry of more than one hundred mechanics and labourers for the Royal carriage department of the Royal Arsenal. The establishment now employs more men than it did during the war of 1814

Several of them were extinguishing lights, broke the crockery belonging to their messes, and insulted their officers. At ten o'clock, however, they has returned to their duty, thanks to the firmness of Commander Wilmot, and several of the mutineers were placed in irons.

Advices from Athens to the 1st instant mention that the King has refused to receive the Address voted by the Senate, in reply to the Royal Speech. The Address had been carried by a majority against Ministers, who strongly opposed its adoption, because it complained of the violation of the rights of the nation by the Government on the occasion of the elections. After the refusal of the King was made known, the creation of nine new Senators was announced by the President of the Council. The Athens Courier says that the greatest alarm was created by the state of matters, and that fears were entertained that further infractions of the Constitution were contemplated.

A memorial from the leading merchants connected with the trade of the River Plate has been presented to Viscount Palmerston on the subject of the blockade of Buenos Ayres, representing the injury which British commerce has already sustained by the blockade, and requesting any information which his Lordship may feel at liberty to give respecting the continuance of the blockade by the French and English. Some new batteries for traversing guns of a very heavy calibre, 68-pounders, have been erected in Fort St. Elmo, on the bastion facing the entrance to the quarantine harbour, and under the Barrack in the grand harbour, called "Bali's Baracca." This last is a very powerful battery, and stands on such an elevation as to be able to fire down upon the decks of any vessel attempting to enter. DEATH OF MR. SCOTT, SEN., THE WELL-KNOWN TRAINER.—Mr. Scott, the celebrated trainer of race horses, was found dead in his room on the morning of Wednesday last, at his residence in the immediate neighbourhood of Ascot Heath. It appears that his servant lad, who had left him on the preceding evening in his sitting room, in apparently good health, on going to his bed-room to call him early on the following morning, and not finding him there, proceeded to the room below, where he discovered him lying stretched upon the floor, quite dead. It is supposed that the deceased was seized with a fit of apoplexy, which was the cause of his death.

ETON COLLEGE. The Prince Consort, attended by the Hon. Captain Gordon, Equerry in Waiting, rode on horseback to Eton on Friday morning at night, and inspected the fresco paintings which had been discovered on the walls of the College Chapel, upon the removal of the oak panelling, while the exterior repairs and alterations were in progress in the interior of the sacred edifice. His Royal Highness, upon his arrival in Weston's yard, was received by the Rev. Mr. Hodgson, the Provost, and was shortly afterwards joined by the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey, the Head Master, by whom the Prince was attended during his visit. These paintings, many of which are in an excellent state of pre-ervation, are supposed to have been executed by Florentine artists in the fifteenth century. They illustrate various miracles alleged by the Roman Catholics to have been performed by the Virgin Mary. At the time the choir was enlarged by Sir Christopher Wren, about the year 1720, these frescoes were hidden by an oak panneling, and to this may be attributed their good preservation for so long a period. A well executed bust of Lord Howe (of "the glorious 1st of June" celebrity), by Bacon, has been presented to the College by Admiral Berkeley Craven. The series of busts presented to the College also includes those of George III., William IV., Lord Chatham, Lord Chancellor Camden, Lord North, the Duke of Newcastle, Bishop Pearson, Gray (the poet), Lord Mansfield, Lord Canning, Lord Grenville, and Charles James Fox. SPLENDID BAPTISMAL SHIELD PRESENTED TO THE PRINCE OF WALES BY THE KING OF PRUSSIA.

EVERY reader of the ceremonial of the Baptism of the Prince of Wales will, doubtless, recollect that King William the Fourth of Prussia stood godfather to the Royal infant. The scene of the event was the Chapel of St. George, at Windsor, and the 1st January, 1842, its commemoration of which the King, while yet in England, resolved to celebrate to his Royal godson [illegible]ld, which, in its character and design should correspond with the [illegible]ness of the Act of the Church performed on that day, and likewise the worths of the present state of German art. On the King's return to Berlin, he communicated his intention to Director Peter Von Cornelius, and to the First Privy Architectural Counsellor Stüler, the former of whom was commanded to design the figures of the Shield, and the latter the architectural ornaments. Stüler achieved his work in six weeks: it was then modeled by the sculptor, August Fisher; the surface was cast in metal, and chased by August Merteus; and the figures were cut in onyx by J. Calandrelli. The composition of the whole, the goldsmith's, enameler's, carved, and other work, was executed by G. Hossauer, Goldsmith to the Court; and the Shield completed on the 18th of January, 1847.

This magnificent work of art has been presented to the Prince of Wales; and the recurrence of his Royal Highness' natal day has suggested itself as an appropriate opportunity of submitting the accompanying representation to our readers; and, by aid of a set of large Illustrations (with letter-press, in German, French, and English), the annexed

DESCRIPTION OF THE SHIELD.

In the centre of the Shield the artist has placed the figure of Him who calls Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life, and who forms the central point of the Christian Faith and Life, and to whom all has reference that is represented on the Shield. The middle Compartment, surrounded by a double line of ornamental work, is divided by a cross into four smaller compartments, which represent the Sacramental fountains of Grace, Baptism and the Lord's Supper, with the respective emblems as contained in the Old Testament; being the opening of the fountain in the rock by Moses, and the fall of Manna. At the extremities of the arms of the Cross are seen the Evangelists noting down what they have seen and heard in the Gospels, in order that the same may communicate to all futurity words of the life everlasting, as inexhaustible sources of divine revelation and doctrine. On the extreme points of the Arabesques that rise above the Evangelists are represented the blossoms of the divine grace and doctrine, the Christian virtues of Faith, Hope, and Charity, and of the all-embracing Christian Righteousness. Around the entire centre stand in a circle the twelve Apostles: Peter is seen under Faith, represented on the Arabesque; on the right and left of him, for the spectator, are Philip and Andrew; James is below Hope; on either side are Bartholomew and Simon; John is placed beneath the figure of Charity; on either side are James the Younger and Thomas; under Righteousness is Paul; on the right and left are Matthew and Judas Thaddeus going forth into the world to teach and to baptise, and to propagate the kingdom of Christ with his mercies. The Relievo, which commences at the Palm-tree, and runs round the edge of the Shield, represents that which is connected with the act of the greatest love, namely, the redeeming atonement of Christ, the foundation of the Church, and the reception into the same by baptism. From the Palm forest a procession is approaching solemnly, the principal personage in which is mounted on the foal of an ass, led by the Apostles Peter, James, and John. It is the heavenly King making his entry into Jerusalem. It appears to be a procession of rejoicing and jubilation, but it brings the approaching King to meet the glory of his sufferings. Under Christ's figure in the centre of the Shield, Christian Love is represented on the point of the Arabesque; at the foot of the same is the Evangelist, who announces to all the divinity of Christ, and the infinite love of the Lord. Under him, the same disciple of Love is the Apostle John, and under him again is the principal figure in the procession, whom love to mankind is leading to death. Angels bear the insignia of the King, but in this procession they are the instruments of suffering, referring to the approaching sacrificatory death. The Jewish people pour forth from the city to meet him rejoicing, and singing Hosina, strewing branches and spreading their garments before him; but the enemies of the Lord, the Pharisees, are not wanting in the procession. At the gate of the city, in an attitude of meditation, sits a female figure, which, as the mural crown denotes, represents the city of Jerusalem itself. The time of the law, as may be inferred from the tablets lying on her lap, will soon have passed; for One has fulfilled the law to its utmost extent for All. Within the city are seen the High Priests sitting in Council, and before them stands Judas, receiving the thirty silver pieces for his betrayal, after Satan had possessed him. In the distance is a representation of Golgotha, with the three crosses erected; the relatives overwhelmed with grief are laying the body of the Lord in a tomb hewn in the rock, from which He rises again alive

Next is a representation of the outpouring of the Holy Spirit; and, inspired thereby, Peter proclaims the resurrection of the Lord, the faith in him, and, with his fellow Apostles, receives into the bosom of the church universal people from among all conditions, by baptism, which from that day of Pentecost down to this day and to the end of time is a condition to the entrance into the church. One of the successors to the Apostles steps forth from among them, and advances, accompanied by the boys bearing the baptismal water, towards the chamber of Queen Victoria, in order to make the Prince of Wales also a member of the Church of Christ, through baptism. A messenger hastening forward from the opposite side of the room, announces to the Queen the arrival of the Royal Sponsor, for whom Prince Albert and the Duke of Wellington, on whose escutcheon the word "Waterloo" is inscribed, are in waiting to welcome him with the cup of hospitality to the friendly hearth. On the coast of England, the King is greeted by the Knight of St. George, the Tutelar Saint of England, after his ship, having sailed from the Rhine and the North Sea, (both are indicated to the left of the Palm-tree,) has arrived in the Thames. The ship is steered by a messenger of the Lord, in order to bring over in safety to England the King and his attendants, consisting of the Baron von Humboldt, who is sitting opposite to him with a plant in his hand; General von Natzmer, and the Count von Stolberg, both of whom are standing behind the Royal Pilgrim, whose head is adorned with the Crown. Thus, all that is represented on the Shield has reference to the belief in Christianity and the reception into its Church; and, in accordance with that belief and reception, the Shield has been dedicated the Buckler of Faith, as the Prince for whom it is intended as a valedictory present, will bear the title "Defensor Fidei." The inscription on the shield runs thus:—

FRIDERICUS GUILELMUS REX BORUSSORUM
ALBERTO EDUARDO PRINCIPI WALLIAE
IN MEMORIAM DIEI BAPT. XXV JAN A. MDCCCXLII

ELIZABETH COLLEGE, GUERNSEY.—Her Majesty has been pleased to nominate Dr. Lushington as a special visitor, to inquire into and settle the matters in dispute in regard to the powers and rights of the principal and the under-masters of this establishment, and also to submit to her Majesty's consideration such alterations of the statutes as he may consider expedient.

THE LATE MR. JUSTICE BOSANQUET.—The will and five codicils of the late Right Hon. Sir John Bernard Bosanquet, P.C., formerly one of her Majesty's Justices of the Court of Common Pleas, has been proved by his nephews, S. R. Bosanquet and J. W. Bosanquet, Esqrs. The personalty was sworn under £100,000. He has left numerous bequests and legacies. To his brother Charles £3000; to his niece, Ellen Laetitia Bosanquet, £30,000 (one-half at her decease to fall into the residue), also the house in Montague-place, and all plate, furniture, books, and pictures; £5,000 to each of his other twelve nephews and nieces, the children of his brothers, Samuel and Charles; to his cousins, as described in the will, £500 each, &c. &c. The deceased died on the 9th of September, at his seat, the Firs, Hampstead, at the age of seventy-four, having directed that he should be buried by the side of his wife, in the family vault at Lantillo Crossenny, Monmouthshire. He has left no issue. He had one son, Lewis Bernard, who also died without issue. The will is dated in 1843, and the five codicils in the years 1845, 1846, and 1847. The whole are in his own handwriting, and, singular to observe, in each instance the attestation clause is inefficient, the Court requiring evidence on affidavit of the respective witnesses that the instruments were executed as the law directs. It may be in the recollection of some of our readers that other distinguished leading members of the bar have, in like manner, in writing their own wills, failed in wording the attestation clause thereto, so as to show that, at the time of the execution thereof, the requirements of the Act were complied with.

SPOT ON THE SUN.—Sir John Herschel states that the black centre of the Sun Spot, May 25, 1837, would have allowed the globe of the earth to drop through it, leaving a thousand miles clear of contact on all sides of that tremendous gulf.

THE MODEL PENNY. Mr. Wyon, of the Mint, has written to the Journals to say that no such coin has emanated from the Mint, and that it is a private undertaking, and, consequently, spurious as regards currency. The model penny piece—a circle of silver in a frame of copper is not a new idea, nor, moreover, unsanctioned by the Mint, and one that was found five-and-twenty years ago expensive and useless. The coin we see in the streets is, therefore, nothing more than a hawker's medal. The report that the five shilling pieces are to be treated in the same manner is equally erroneous.

THE NEW COUNTY COURTS.—An important question has been raised in some of the County Courts with respect to the jurisdiction of the tribunals in matters of insolvency. By the recent Act the two branches of insolvency were transferred to the New Courts. The Act was passed on the 22nd of July, and came into operation on the 16th of September. In the interim several petitions were filed, and the cases, in due course, came on for hearing before the New Courts. At York, on Friday, several cases were objected to on the ground of the Court having no jurisdiction to entertain the applications. The Judge deferred his decision until he had consulted the Commissioners of the Insolvent Debtors' Court. By some oversight in the new Act there is no power of appeal given.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT.

The Court is still staying at Windsor, and each morning her Majesty and Prince Albert (weather permitting) take their accustomed early walk, while the younger members of the Royal Family take walking and pony exercise.

On Monday, the Royal dinner-party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cent, the Excellencies Count and Countess Dietrichstein, Baroness de Speth, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, Lady Clementina Villiers, Viscount Palmerston, and Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner.

Tuesday was the birthday of his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The 1st Battalion of the Grenadier Guards and the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards on duty at Windsor were inspected in the morning by the Queen and Prince Albert, who were accompanied by the Prince of Wales, and also by Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice. The inspection took place in the Home Park. Count Dietrichstein, the Austrian Ambassador, and the other visitors of her Majesty, together with the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, were present, at nine o'clock, in the Home Park. Shortly before that hour, the Grenadier Guards, commanded by Colonel J. R. Craufurd, and the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards, commanded by Colonel Bouverie, arrived on the ground, taking up their station directly opposite to the eastern terrace. The whole of the troops were under the command of Colonel Craufurd, the senior Field Officer at Windsor. Immediately upon the arrival of her Majesty the troops fired a feu-de-joie, commencing on the right of the line; and afterwards, taking off their caps, gave three hearty cheers. The Royal Horse Guards then marched past her Majesty in slow and quick time, the band playing the regimental march; followed by the Grenadier Guards, the band of that regiment performing the "Coburg March," and the "British Grenadiers." The two regiments then formed in line as before, and gave her Majesty the Royal salute, both bands playing the National Anthem. The troops then again marched past her Majesty, and left the ground for their respective barracks. The Royal party then returned, and proceeded to the Castle through George the Fourth's Gateway. His Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting in the course of the morning, accompanied by the Count Dietrichstein (Austrian Ambassador), and attended by Lord Canoys and Captain the Hon. A. Gordon. The Earl and Countess Spencer arrived in the evening at the Castle, on a visit to her Majesty. The Queen had a dinner party. The company included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Excellencies the Count and Countess Dietrichstein, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, and Lady Clementina Villiers, the Earl and Countess Spencer, Viscount Palmerston, Baroness de Speth.

On Wednesday morning his Royal Highness Prince Albert enjoyed the sport of shooting, accompanied by Count Dietrichstein, the Earl of Jersey, and Earl Spencer. the Hon. Captain Gordon, Equerry in Waiting, attending on horseback. His Excellency Baron de Brunnow and the Rev. Dr Philpott (Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge) were expected to arrive at the Castle in the evening, on a visit to the Queen. Their Excellencies Count and Countess Dietrichstein and Viscount Palmerston took their departure from the Castle on Wednesday. The Royal dinner-party included his Excellency Baron de Brunnow, the Earl and Countess of Jersey and Lady Clementina Villiers, the Earl and Countess Spencer, Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, and the Rev. Dr. Philpott (Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge). The Guards' Band, together with her Majesty's private band, attended as usual.

On Thursday, his Excellency Baron de Brunnow, the Earl and Countess of Jersey, and Lady Clementina Villiers, left the Castle. The Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Earl and Countess Spencer, Baroness de Speth, Sir Robert and Lady Gardiner, the Rev. Dr. Philpott (Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge), and the Rev. Dr. Hodgson (Provost of Eton.) The band of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards attended during dinner. The Queen's private band afterwards attended in the Castle.

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge returned to his residence at Kew on Wednesday, from the Royal Military College at Sandhurst.

Not many days since, Messrs. Roth and Freeman, of Old Bond-street, were honoured with the Royal command to make several suits of clothes of new design and materials, for his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales. The cloth is very light and fine; the jackets are bright blue, lined with crimson silk; dark lake, with white; maroon, with blue; all trimmed with silk braid, of design corresponding with that in which our Artist has portrayed the young Prince. The waistcoats are of the same material, made plain, and the trousers of the same, with plaited fronts. In addition to the above is a black jacket, lined with white silk, and braided as above; and white satteen waistcoats and trousers, besides waistcoats and trousers of fancy Scotch tartans. The materials are of the finest quality; and the style is altogether tasteful and striking.

It is now stated that the King of the Belgians' visit to this country has been for the present postponed. It is also stated that the reigning Duke and Duchess of Saxe Coburg will not arrive in England, upon a visit to her Majesty, until a considerably later period than had been expected.

His Excellency Soleiman Pacha, Ambassador from the Sublime Porte at Paris arrived at the Turkish Embassy in Bryanstone-square on Friday se'nnight, accompanied by his Secretaries, Remzi Effendi and Mons. Antoine Fleger. His Excellency purposes remaining a few weeks in England.

HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE PRINCE OF WALES, IN HIS BIRTHDAY SUIT.

BIRTH-DAY OF THE PRINCE OF WALES—Nov. 9, 1847.

A day of joy to England comes,—in proud and happy times,—
It bears our Nation's gladness thro' all the Empire's climes;
Canadian skies, and Afric's sands, with the deep glow of Ind;
From burning Western Tropics, to the shining hills of Scinde;
From where the Slave first felt the glance of Freedom on his soul,
To where bright British Victory flames up her old control!
The glorious Sun that gleams upon our PRINCE OF WALES's Birth!
Goes lighting all the Realms around, but sets not on the Earth!

The Queen!—the Queen of Nations, that were won beyond the sea;
Braves her young boy before them all,—gem of their galaxy!
And, as she nobly rears the Star of her Imperial Crown, —Proud of the youthful lustre which her Womanhood hands down—
She reads "ICH DIEN," below the plume that decks her Princely boy,—
And cries "Serve on, my regal Child—serve well without alloy!
Make the bright feathers loved, my Prince—all gladness and no gloom!—
Blest be,—where'er thy Mother reigns—the PRINCE OF WALES's PLUME!"

Now SCOTLAND's Thistle, ENGLAND's Rose, and Erin's Shamrock green
Are nose-gay'd by the "triple Arm," that waves "God Save the Queen."
And as Old Ocean swells away, the echoes of a sound
That rings our Nation's Loyalty to all the Shores around;
There is no Colony but drinks the music of its gales,
And quaffeth back, to England's Queen "Health to her PRINCE OF WALES."

Ere now, the Boy has worn the garb that Sanctifies our Wars;
The Blue-dyed Red on Nelson's breast—the Jacket of our Tars!
And had poor Dibdin lived—(the pride of all our Sailor Bards)
When young "WALES" walk'd the quarter deck, and Britain mann'd the yards,
He must have felt that Victory will still swell full our sails,
While proud Victoria loves and trains a Sailor "PRINCE OF WALES."

His glorious Name? Out, ring it loud, and dutiful and clear!
ALBERT—grown to the Nation now—as to the Sovereign—dear!
EDWARD!——Black Prince of Olden Days—then meteor of our might—
Passing the words that History has balo'd with her light
With an untarnished lustre;—whose lesson, unto him
Is, that our Royal Boy of Wales may never let it dim:
For triumph past—for present love—our Queen, the Nation hails,
With Joy to "ALBERT EDWARD"—and "LONG LIVE THE PRINCE OF WALES!"

OLD LONDON claims him Citizen!—for evermore her own,—
—For he was born when London's King was usher'd to his throne!
For Six brief years—with Civic Feasts—his Festival they mix,
And NOW the finest BIRTHDAY comes—and brightest of the Six!
Oh! never such a Canopy of Blue NOVEMBER wore,
Never, so shone, o'er all the Land,—November Sun before,
Then if an Omen Heaven-born be one that never fails
SUN AND BLUE SKY SHALL BLESS THE LIFE OF OUR DEAR "PRINCE OF WALES."

LITERATURE.

THE DOCTOR. Vol. VII. Longman and Co.

(Concluded from page 283.)

The Doctor's theory of the vegetable world, tracing many of his acquaintance there, leads to some sad facts and fancies; admitting, by the way, that crabbed tempers, sour plums, cherry cheeks, and hearts of oak, are nothing more than metaphorical expressions of similitude. However, there comes to the rescue of the doctrine—Man a Tree—and Dona Oliva Sabuco Barrera, who, in her "New Philosophy of Man," first printed in 1587, thought the human body might be called a tree reversed, the brain the root, and the other the bark; and that in the brain, as in the root of the natural tree, all diseases had their origin. Some of her remedies were pleasant enough

"Hope is what supports health and life; fear, the worst enemy."

Among the best preservatives of health are restoratives, and, second, disorder, cheerfulness, sweet odours, music, the country, the sound of woods and waters, agreeable conversation, and pleasant pastimes. Music, of all external things, is also held to be that which lends most to comfort, rejoice and strengthen the brain, being, as it were, a spiritual pleasure in which the mind sympathises; and the first of all remedies, in this, for true system of medicine, was to bring the mind and body into a pleasing, tuneful state, in which is created "a sensitive ear and a quick perception of odours, as well as with a cheerful temper, and an active mind for whole course of practice was intended to cheer and comfort the patient, if that was possible. She allowed the free use of wine and fresh air, and recommended that the apartments of the sick should be well ventilated. She prescribed refreshing odours, among others that of bread fresh from the oven, and that wine should be placed near the fire, in order to infuse some heat. She even thought that cheerful apparel conduced to health, and that the fashion of wearing black which prevailed in her time was repugnant to reason. She recommended, also, cutting the hair, and washing the head with white wine, which as it were renovated the skin, and improved the vegetation. Reasonably she observed that animals might reach to the utility of exercise, seeing how the young lambs sported in the field, and dogs played with each other, and birds rejoiced in the al

Dona Oliva's philosophy and practice occupy many more pages; she was, evidently, a sustainer of the dignity of woman, in her time; and the system of 200 years since, may shame the sloth of our days in "the health of towns."

The kernel of the Doctor's "Wishing Interchapter" is quaintly amusing:

"In wishing, it is as well to wish for enough. By enough, in the way of riches, is meant is said to mean always something more than he has. I will limit my desires to a positive sum, and wish for just one million a-year. And first for my private expenditure, I would take my house to my mind, or build one; and it should be such as a house ought to be, when I am heard a glorious epithet to set define a house that should have in it every thing that is voluptuous, and necessary, and right.' In my acceptation of that felicitous definition, I request the reader to understand that every thing which is right is intended, and nothing but what is perfectly so: that is to say, I mean every possible accommodation conducive to health and comfort. It should be large enough for my friends, and not so large as to serve as an hotel for my acquaintance; and I would live in it at the rate of five thousand a-year, beyond which no rea and reasonable enjoyment is to be obtained by money. I would entertain keep hounds, nor hunters, nor running horses. I would neither solicit nor accept a Peerage. I would not go into Parliament. I would take no part whatever in what is called public life, farther than to give my vote at an election against a Whig, or against any one who would give his in favour of the Catholic question. I would, in a word, live as quite so the reclusive as I do at present; but I would still keep to my old shoes, as long as they would keep on me. But stop—Cleopatra adopted some wizard's words when she said, 'Wishers were ever fools!'"

The next "Chapter on Names," is, of course, a droll one: here is a specimen:

"It is not a good thing to be Tom'd or Bob'd, Jack'd or Jim'd, Sam'd or Ben'd, Natty'd or Batty'd, Neddy'd or Teddy'd, Will'd or Bill'd, Dick'd or Nick'd, Joe'd or Harry'd, as you go through the world. And yet it is worse to have a christian name, that is to say, one which shall be in everybody's mouth, and familiar as household words, as if it were pinned upon your back, or labelled upon your forehead. Quintin Dick, for example, which would have been still more unlucky if Mr. Dick had happened to have cast in his eye. The Report on the Metropolitan Police Institution contains a singular example of the inconvenience which may arise from giving a child an unsuch christian name. A gentleman called Ankrell Gray had occasion for a certificate of his son's age: it was known at what parish he had been baptised, but, on searching the register there, no such name could be found; some mistake was presumed, therefore, not in the entry, but in the recollection of the parties, and many other registers were examined without success. At length the first register was again recurred to, and then, upon a closer investigation, they found him entered as Miss Ann Kettle Grey

"Mr Keightley's observation, that 'a man's name and his occupation have often a most curious coincidence,' rests, perhaps, on a similar ground, men being sometimes designated by their names for the way of life which they are to pursue. Many a boy has been called Nelson or Sir Cloudesley Shovel, that he might [illegible] Captain Death could never have practised medicine or surgery, unless under the name of Alias; but there would be no better name with which to meet an enemy in battle."

We must pass over much that is curious, to get at a chapter or two of oddities on Rat-catching:—

"There are two things to be considered here—first, how to catch rats; and secondly, how to destroy them when caught. And the first of these questions is a delicate one, when a dexterous rat-catch has received more than any that was ever heard of before, except in the famous adventure of the Pied Piper of Hamelin. Jack Robinson had some reputation in his day for his professional talents in this line, but he was a bungler in comparison with Mr. Peel. The second belongs to a science which Jeremy the thrice illustrious Bentham calls Phthonomics, or the art of destruction applied to noxious animals, a science which the said Jeremy proposes should form part of the course of studies in his Chrestomathic school. There are no other animals in this country who do so much mischief now as the disciples of Jeremy himself. But, leaving this pestilent set, as one of the plagues with which Great Britain is afflicted for its sins; and intending no offence to any particular Bishop, Peer, Baronet, Peer-expectant, or public man whatever, and protesting against any application of what may here be said to any person who is, has been, or may be included under any of the foregoing denominations, I shall satisfy the good-natured reader's desires, and inform him in what manner our Philosopher and Zoophilist (philanthropist is a word which would poorly express the benevolence of the benevolent) of those once committed to us to the best manner of taking and destroying rats. Protesting, therefore, once more, as is needful in these ticklish times, that I am speaking not of the Rat-pack or Anti-Hanoverian rat, which is a new species of the Parliament rat, but of the old Norway or Hanoverian one, which in the last century effected the conquest of our island by extirpating the original British breed, I inform the humane reader that the Doctor recommended nothing better than the common rat-catcher's receipt, which is to lure them into a cage by oil of caraways, or of rhodium; and that, when entrapped, the speediest and easiest death which can be inflicted is by sticking the cage in water.

"Wheresoever man goes, Rat follows, or accompanies him. Town or country are equally agreeable to him. He enters upon your house as a tenant at will, in the town, not yours, when he puts out for himself accordingly, your will to keep by it from one story to another, and leaving you the larger apartments, taken possession of the space between floor and ceiling, as an entresol for himself. Here he has his parties, and his routs, and his gambols, very nearly over your head, when you would be asleep, if it were not for the spirit with which the young and belles of Rat land keep up the ball over your head.'

Luther's "Table Talk," and its wonderful preservation by Captain H. Bell, is too well known for company among book rarities: however, here it is. Then we pass by chapters of strange legends, to a bundle of materials (extracts chiefly), showing "how the learned Southey worked up the scraps of paper." Each extract is on a separate slip of paper, and some of them appear to have been a side from thirty to forty years ago. Here is an odd story from the mass

"Lord Dalmeny, son of the Earl of Rosebery, married, about eighty years ago a widow at Bath, for her beauty. They went abroad, she sickened, and when her death-bed requested that she might be interred in some particular churchyard, either in Sussex or Suffolk, I forget which. The body was embalmed, but at the custom-house in the port where it was landed, the officer suspected smuggling and insisted on opening it. They recognised the features of the wife of their own clergyman, who, having been married to him against her own inclination, had eloped. Both husbands followed the body to the grave. The grandfather of Dr. Smith, of Norwich, knew the Lord."

"The Doctor" had an odd notion that there should be physicians for all parishes:

There should be a State Physician to the King, besides his Physicians ordinary and extraordinary one whose sole business should be to watch over the Royal health, as connected with the discharge of the highest trust, that of head keeper of the King's health. For the same reason, there ought to be a Physician for the Cabinet, a Physician for the Privy Council, a Physician for the Bench of Bishops, a Physician for the twelve Judges, two for the House of Lords, one for the House of Commons, one for the Admiralty, one for the War Office, one for the Directors of the East India Company (there was no board of Control in the Doctor's days, or he would certainly have advised that a Physician should be placed upon that Establishment also); one for the Lord Mayor, two for the Common Council, four for the Livery. (He was speaking in the days of Wilkes and Liberty.) How much mischief, said he, might have been prevented by capping the Lord Mayor, blistering a few of the Aldermen, administering salts and manna to lower the pulse of over patriotism, and keeping the city orators upon a low regimen for a week before every public meeting. Then, in the Cabinet, what evils might be averted by administering laxatives or corroborants as the case required in the Lords and Commons, by clearing away bile, evacuating ill-humours, and, occasionally, by cutting for the simples."

In addition, members should go through a preparatory course of medicine before every session, and be carefully attended as long as Parliament was sitting.

[illegible] sometimes happened that the portrait of one person has proved also to be a good likeness of another. Many Turkish women possessed his own features and expression in one of Michael Angelo's devils. And in real life, two faces, even though there be no relationship between the parties, may be all but indistinguishable; as the Doctor has remarked in a personality too recent for the other yet no parity of character can be inferred from this resemblance. Poor Captain Atkins, who was lost in the Defence, off the coast of India, in 1811, had a double of this kind, that was the torment of his life; and the double was a swindler, who having discovered the lucky fac-simileship, obtained goods, took up money, and, at last, married a wife in his name. Once when the real Captain Atkins returned from a distant station, his poor mother was always awaiting him at Plymouth, put off in a boat, boarded the ship as soon as it came to anchor, and ran to welcome him as her husband."

The volume closes with a hundred pages of Fragments. They consist of "Himbers laid" for chapters on all sorts of hobbies—beards, cats, and Cato's Eden—the latter, by the way, at Greta Hall, with Memoir of the Cats therein; and, above all, a rambling, but much amusing story of two mopsticks dressed like a man and woman, and placed as scarecrows in a garden at Keswick: there are many strange doings related of these statues; but, says the account, on "Sunday evening last, the most astonishing display of wonderful power occurred, for the woman, instead of being in her place among the pease, appeared standing erect on the top of Mr. Fisher's haystow in the forge field, and there, on the following morning was seen to be lying all asleep, with her witnesses of the fact." Yet, they were made by a Keswick carpenter, and their evidence offered from the Doctor's Vol. VII. The affair at Keswick became as notorious as Prince Hohenlohe's miracles elsewhere

The book closes with a Sonnet on the Author, by William Nicol, the printer, in which the characteristics of the work are thus fondly summed up

"Learning diffuse, quaint humour, lively wit,
Satire severe and bold, or covert, sly,
Turning within itself the mental eye
To fancies strange that round its spirit flit,
Unknown to others, and by self scarce seen:
Teaching, in sweetest English, England's plan -
Prince Hohenlohe miracles elsewhe
Honour to God and charity to man:
Who wrote the Doctor? her best Son, I ween,
Whether his works, or his fair life you scan."

THE BOTANIC GARDEN; or, Magazine of Hardy Flowering Plants. To which is added the Parterre. By B. Maund, F.L.S. Groombridge.

This elegant work progresses in interest, as in numbers. In that for the present month, we find figured the "Schafta Catchfly," which Mr. Maund describes as one of the prettiest annualities that has lately been added to our hardy flower-borders. It is a delightfully gay plant, and will do well in pots.

"Where entire beds of very low plants are adopted, this would form one of the most desirable flower-decoration, bright and continuous, flower touching flower: and standing as gold against lead, in companionship with the most brilliant of the tapestry ever wrought by the Gobelins. Mention is first made of it at Dorpat, in the west of Russia: whence it was transmitted to the Imperial Gardens at St. Petersburg; and from this establishment to the Horticultural Society of London. Then it is, now-a-days, that the riches of the earth are equally dispensed to all her children. It may be raised from seeds or cuttings."

This is an average specimen of the lovely which the indefatigable Editor is constantly infusing into his very interesting journal. The plates of the work, flowers and fruit, continue to be beautifully coloured.

MUSIC.

WESTERN MADRIGAL SOCIETY.—The first meeting for the season took place on Saturday night, at the rooms of the Royal Society of Musicians, in Lisle-street, Mr. Evans, the President, in the chair. There was a full attendance of members and professors. Eight new members were proposed, but as the Society is full, must wait for the vacancies, the number being limited to forty. Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, conducted the programme, which comprised several favourite works of the old masters. Mr. Hennessy, Secretary, G. Budd, Esq., in the course of the evening, made the agreeable announcement that, at the next meeting (20th), the library would be enriched by the addition of forty compositions by the ancient masters, some of which would be heard for the first time.

ROYAL SOCIETY OF MUSICIANS.—At the last monthly meeting of this admirable institution, M. Costa, conductor at the concerts of the Philharmonic Society, was introduced as a member, having been duly elected.

BRIGHTON MUSICAL UNION.—Mr. and Mdme. Ourry have commenced a series of Weekly Musical Meetings, at the Old Ship Assembly Rooms, under the above designation, for the performance of two grand Trios of Beethoven, and two morceaux brutants, executed by Mdme. de Belleville Ourry, as pianiste; Messrs. Ourry and Cramer, violins; Mr. Hill, cenor; and Piatti, violoncello. The second Meeting took place on Tuesday evening, when a numerous and fashionable audience, the Brighton Musical Union, are the Earl of Westmoreland, the Earl of Falmouth, the Hon. Gen. Upton, the Hon. Laurence Parsons, Admiral Sir Bladen and Lady Capel, Captain and Mrs. Ourry, Sir Thomas Read, professional amateurs, town have season to be gratified with the spirit and good taste displayed by M. Ourry, in establishing such excellent entertainments. Mdme. Ourry is one of the first of lady pianists—plays with a masculine power, and FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBTUOR.

MUNICH, NOV. 5.

Among the many interesting objects in this city, is one which is too seldom visited by travellers, when they rest here in their rapid course of sight seeing. I allude to the Glassaleries, or establishment for the fabrication and painting of stained glass. Englishmen, especially, seldom ask for it; yet it would be well worthy the attention, at a time when there is in England so strong a tendency towards a revival and reasuscitation of the past; more especially in reference to the decoration of sacred edifices, and other public buildings. However, there is one thing to be said on behalf of English travellers, who only come to Munich for a few days. It is extremely difficult for a stranger to discover the localities where this art—to Munich of such vast importance in the fitting up of the magnificent churches is carried on. It has taken me three weeks to find it out, and at last I found it accidentally, assisted by a strong effort of discernment and moral courage. Had I wished to know where the best bear was to be bought, three minutes would have sufficed to provide me with a highly intelligent inhabitant, who would con amore have conducted me to the favourite house. But when I wanted the Glasmalerei, that was a different affair. I asked high and low, rich and poor—to no purpose. One enlightened gentleman, an officer and sprig of nobility, turned quite pale as to be sorry, and I was fain to discover the latitude . . . But, alas! my satisfaction was brief. He conducted me to what is certainly a very beautiful warehouse—in the Hofgarten—where the most exquisite specimens of Glasmalerei are on sale. The very young and thankless nation had been fascinated by the splendour of those drinking glasses, for one of which, shaped for beer and tipped with chased silver, his mouth watered another individual, with a splendid Caucasian head, and a board of majestic magnitude, told me I must have a carriage, and order post horses; for that the Glasmalerei was some fifty miles from Munich. He, too, was thinking of the drinking glasses, and not of the church windows. And at length, driven to my own resources, I sectionized the environs of Munich (which is easily done, so admirably has the King laid out the plan of the new city), and at length succeeded in finding the Glasmalerei (from which some of the most splendid windows in Europe have been furnished), at a distance of less than ten miles from my own hotel! So much for Munich insensibility. No man is a prophet in his own country; and the adage applies to the Bavarian Demosthenes. Those two or three-and-twenty years ago, the King of Bavaria determined on endeavouring to restore the art, and he proceeded to accomplish his object in the most effective of all ways. He sent artists to England, as sons very beautiful windows in a church about a mile from Tunbridge Wells, a village the name of which I forgot, but immediately adjoining Bedgebury Park, the seat of Viscount (and Marshal) Beresford, by whom they were ordered from Munich. The finest things I ever presented in my course of completion in this establishment, are four colossal windows, two of which are already finished, for the Cathedral at Cologne. As specimens of art, whether for the designs themselves, or the execution, they are perfect

The process itself is singularly simple. The glass is stained, where necessary, of various faint colours, in the manufacture. Of this, the surface is removed, in those parts where other colours are to go, or where there is to be light; the parts where the surface is so removed are white, with a rough surface. The colours are laid on, just as on a picture, with turpentine oil, and, when they are dried, they are p aced in a heated oven for three or four hours. Each window is composed of innumerable small pieces, in cutting which (with the diamond) the broad lines of the drawing are followed. When disjointed, they look like the parts of a Chinese puzzle. When the process is complete, all these pieces are joined together by a binding of lead, and then the grand whole is accomplished. Every part of the building is highly interesting. The utmost silence prevails, while the various artists are executing the delicate work required for the pictures. There are, among the specimens, some copies of pictures by Van Eyck, which represent with beautiful fidelity the singular minuteness of detail, and the brilliancy of colour which characterise the originals.

Sunday and Monday last witnessed several religious ceremonies here, on the part of both Catholic and Protestants. The Queen of Bavaria, being a Protestant, attended the Protestant Church in state, and crowds flocked to see her. Consolation assembled to take part in the general devotion. The people here, both Catholic and Protestant, go to their prayers on special saints' days, very early in the morning. It is not unusual to find a household in mourning half-past four, and, after they have taken coffee, the females trudge away to church by five. The men meanwhile pay their devotions to another deity, with heavy snores. On Sunday there was also an interesting ceremony, quite characteristic of the Catholic country. Close to Munich is the city cemetery of great size, and already, to all appearance, nearly full. The inhabitants pay great attention and respect to the remains of their deceased relatives and friends. In this cemetery there is not a grave that has not a monument, more or less costly. As the right of burial belongs to all citizens alike, rich and poor, and free of charge, that there should be so many expensive monuments, shows that many persons possess the art to pay to great expense (that is to say great in Munich) in order to do honour to the dead. Over every grave is a little flower bed, variously decorated with Christian emblems. And it is pleas ng to see with what assiduity the people, and especially the young and children, attend to these little graceful memorials, perpetually sprinkling the flowers with holy water, which is kept in vessels for the purpose. If a stranger passing does the like, it is considered a mark of respect, and attention and respect. On Sunday, thousands of persons made their way to this cemetery, when, according to annual custom, the whole of the graves were decorated with garlands and festoons of flowers, and with evergreens, presenting a most pleasing sight to see such multitudes of people, so serious and orderly, coming thus to discharge the customary duties to the dead. Another custom prevailing here, as elsewhere in Germany, is to expose, for a week or more, the bodies of those who have died during the week, in a large receptacle at the end of the cemetery, the interior of which can be seen through large glass windows. The deceased persons are dressed in their usual dress, and are all cut out on biers. Tapers burn night and day in the apartment, and a member of the family of e ch deceased person watches during the time in an adjoining chamber. This practice is in accordance with an old law, which was enacted for the purpose of at once preventing premature interment of persons who might not really be dead, and also of discouraging foul play to invalids. According to the strict law, there should be a bell-pull close to the hand of each body, so that an alarm could instantly be sounded.

However slow the Munich people are in some things, I must do them the justice to say that here you can hear music in perfection. Last Monday was given the first of the annual series of Subscription Concerts, in the Odéon. The price of admission is 1 florin (1s. 8d.) to the best places, and 30 kreuzers (1s.) to the gallery. A subscription for four concerts is only two florins. For the insignificant sum you hear the finest music. On Monday the band performed the "Sinfonia Eroica," of Beethoven, in a style I have never heard surpassed, even at the most expensive concerts in London; and a Herr Menter performed a solo on the violoncello so admirably that were he to go to London he would distance all competitors. There was also some excellent singing by Madame Pellegrini, and Herr Lange; and, altogether, I never enjoyed a musical treat of so high an order for so little money.

The political atmosphere here is almost at an end. The Government has issued orders to the Censors to "do their spirting gently," which seems, for the present, to have satisfied the Chamber.

NEW MODE OF COMMUNICATING BETWEEN GUARDS AND DRIVERS OF RAILWAY TRAINS. Experiments were made this week, on the Brighton and Chichester Branch Railway, of an invention, by Messrs. Brett and Little, of Furnival's Inn, for giving means of communication between railway guards and drivers, by the following explanatory survey we convey an idea of the proposed plan of communication:—On the engine, and close to the driver, is placed an alarm bell, of a peculiar but simple construction, not liable to get out of order, or to be affected by the oscillation of a train, and requiring to be wound up to a clock only about once a week for ordinary use. When not required for signals, the alarm is prevented from acting by a catch. Contiguous to this is a permanent magnet connected with the inventors' patent galvanometer, which is placed at the opposite end of the tender. Wires are passed from the alarm to the battery, and thence continued throughout the train in this manner:—Carriages forming a train are usually attached to each other by the ordinary screw and hook and "coupling irons," on each side of which are "safety chains" hanging loose, and coming into action only in the event of a derangement of the "couplers;" from chain to chain of each carriage is placed a galvanised wire, running beneath the carriage longitudinally, so that the simple operation of hooking the usual safety chains forms a galvanic communication with as many carriages as are furnished with the connecting wires. At every guard's compartment, pairs of branch wires is carried up at the end of the carriage into the box, where, by the simple operation of moving a small winch, the galvanic circuit is completed, the momentary effect of which is to cause the bell to sound, and the alarm is set in motion close to the driver. Pairs of branch wires can likewise be carried into every carriage of the train, if thought desirable, and thus a means is afforded to the passengers as well as guards of communicating the driver of danger in the experiments which have been made, the safety chains were in their usual condition, and it was, consequently, anticipated that some failures might have occurred from the rust remaining in the contact of the links, and, therefore, the galvanic circuit, incomplete. Such, however, was not the case. In every instance the signal was made without a single failure. To avoid, however, the possibility of a failure from this cause, the caddasons of chains long out of use, it is proposed by the inventors that the chains should be galvanized by a very simple and inexpensive process. The driver was directed to indicate that he had heard the bell by blowing his whistle. The cost of signals, or mode of telegraphing to him a message, will of course be a subject of future arrangement, and presents no difficulty, should the galvanic apparatus, which we have endeavoured to describe, eventually succeed, as the railway officers confidently anticipate will be the case, from the success attending the experiments.

IRELAND.

THE IRISH COUNCIL.—On Saturday, the adjourned meeting of the Irish Council was held at the Rotunda; the Right Hon. Lord Cloncurry in the chair. A resolution having been carried to the effect that, with the view of increasing employment during the ensuing winter, a selection of the unfinished public works should be completed, under local supervision—that every facility should be afforded for reproductive employment on land, by enabling proprietors to invest capital in the improvement of their estates—that encouragement should be given to the construction of railways, by loans, and by introducing more simple and effective machinery for acquiring the land necessary for railway purposes—and that, in every case where practicable, Irish manufactures should be promoted, the meeting adjourned to Tuesday, on which day the discussion on the subject of "Tenant-right" was resumed. Lord Cloncurry was again in the chair, but in the general attendance there was a considerable falling off. The meeting was addressed by Messrs. Fitzgibbon, Dixson, Ferguson, Grier, J. O'Connell, and in a remarkably clear and able speech by Mr. Sharman Crawford, who gave a most intelligible exposition of "Tenant-right." The discussion continued until four o'clock, and was then further adjourned.

DEATH OF MR. MAYNE, ASSISTANT-BARRISTER OF MAYO.—This melancholy event took place on Sunday last, at Westport House, the seat of the Marquis of Sligo. Mr. Mayne was attacked by the spotted fever, which is raging in the west, while officiating in his court at Westport. It is said that Mr. O'Shaughnessy, the Chairman of Louth, goes to Mayo, and that Mr. Chas. Granby Burke has already received his appointment to that county from the Lord Lieutenant.

THE MAGISTRACY.—Major D'Aubeny, of the 55th Regiment, commanding the troops in the district of Killaloe, has been appointed a magistrate of the county of Clare. Captain Cumberledge, of the 54th Regiment, has been appointed to the commission of the peace for the county Limerick

A ROMAN CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY IN IRELAND.—The project of erecting a Roman Catholic University, in accordance with the recommendations of the Holy See, is stated as certain to be carried out. One of the Irish prelates has put down his name for £10,000, and a parish priest for £500.

CROWN OFFICE.—The following arrangements in this office have been just made:—Walter Glascock, Esq., the first assistant-registrar, to retire on superannuation allowance; John F. Chapman, Esq., second assistant-registrar, to succeed Mr. Glascock; and P. V. Fitzpatrick, Esq., of Eccles-street (secretary to the O'Connell tribute), to be appointed to Mr. Chapman's place.

THE Royal Agricultural Society is carrying out the excellent propositions of the Earl of Cla endon. A sufficient sum being at the disposal of the Council, the country has been parcelled into districts, of which the following being most in need of information, and the most remote, as well as distressed, are to be supplied with institutions, free of all expense. The districts are seven. 1st. The West Riding of Cork, comprising the unions of Skibbereen, Dunmanway, Bandon, Bantry, and Macroom. 2nd. The county of Kerry, south of Tralee, comprising the unions of Kenmare, Killarney, and Cahirciveen. 3rd. West of Limerick, and North of Kerry, comprising the unions of Newcastle Tralee, Listowel, and Rathkeale. 4th. Unions of Scariff, Kilrush, Ennistymon, and Ennis, Clare. 5th. Unions of Cl f, close to Westport, Galway. 6th. Unions of Castlebar, Belmullet, and Ballina, Mayo. 7th. Glenties and Stranorlar, Donegal. Each instructor, whose salary is not to exceed £20 per month, is to visit the farming classes per week, and two months at least in each locality, travelling about wherever his attendance may be required, or it might be useful to visit

GOVERNMENT, it is said, are about to adopt vigorous measures for the repression of the conspiracy against life and property which has declared itself so forcibly during the last six months. The Mail says: "We have reason to believe that an arms' act of an extremely stringent character is in course of preparation, and will be laid before Parliament at as early a period as possible."

THE Lord Lieutenant has just offered rewards of £100 each for the discovery of the murderers of Major Mahon and the unhappy Widow Darmody.

REGISTRY OFFICE. The following are the amounts of the stamp duties, which near a thousand are undefended; 107 ejectments, and 347 prisoners for trial. This is only for one riding.

INCREASE OF LAW BUSINESS.—In the Court of Queen's Bench (Ireland), since the end of the last term, there have been double the number of writs issued for the corresponding period of last year; viz., 2000 for last Michaelmas Term, and 4000 for the present term. In the Courts of Exchequer and Common Pleas, there is a corresponding increase. In the Court of Chancery, the bills filed within the last three months, principally for the foreclosure of mortgages, are—for September, 260; and for October, about 300.

A SIGN OF THE TIMES.—At the Insolvent Debtors' Court, Dublin, on Saturday last, there were no less than 101 cases set down on the list for hearing; and yet the number were nine attorneys, one barrister, one law student, and one physician

MELANCHOLY ACCIDENT. As Mrs. French, of Fitzwilliam-square, Dublin, was driving in her carriage car down Upper Mount-street, about one o'clock on Tuesday, she fell off, and was killed on the spot. The horse was going at a rapid pace, and it is supposed the lady was thrown from the car by a sudden jolt, and consequently no blame can be attached to any party. Mrs. French is the aunt of Sir Lucius O'Brien, M.P. for the county Clare, and William Smith O'Brien, Esq., M.P. for the county Limerick, and a star of the late Sir Edward O'Brien. She had attained her 78th year, when she met with the fatal and unlooked-for accident, which will occasion the greatest possible amount of grief to her numerous and highly respectable connections.

On Monday the Repeal Association met as usual in Conciliation Hall After the ordinary despatch of business, Mr. John O'Connell read a letter from the Reasurers of Limerick, which contained the large contribution of £76 18s. 10d. towards the funds of the association. Week's rent, £36 5s. 7d.

EMBEZZLEMENT AND FORGERY AT THE BOARD OF WORKS, DUBLIN.—Mr. Mason, the accountant of the Board of Works, was on Monday last committed by the magistrates of Henry-street Police office, on the charge of embezzlement and forgery. An inquiry into the entire working of the Board during the last twelve months is going on at the Custom house, and it is said that so complicated are the transactions, that the Englis officials to whom it has been committed, have taken houses in the city for the year. Mr. O'Hea, for the prisoner, left it to the Bench to say whether it was not a case for bail. The prisoner was in a very bad state of health, owing to a recent accident, by which he lost his leg, and an imprisonment now might prove fatal to him before a trial could be had Mr. Stewart, the solicitor who conducted the case for the prosecution, could not, as the charge of uttering a draft was one of forgery, and as the amount interested amounted to £8000, agree to admitting the prisoner to bail. The unhappy prisoner, who appeared immersed in bodily and mental suffering, was removed to Newgate.

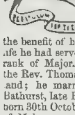
THE CHOLERA. The Emperor of Russia has commanded that the levying of recruits, which, by virtue of an Imperial manifesto, was postponed from September 13 to November 13, shall be further postponed to January 13, 1848, in consequence of the cholera, which has broken out in the Government of Taurres. The Union Monarchique of Saturday mentions two more cases of a choleric nature observed within the last few days at Paris. Both patients have promptly recovered.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR NATHANIEL LEVETT PEACOCKE, BART.

THIS Baronet, whose death occurred last week, was eldest son and heir of the late Sir Joseph Peacocke, of Barntree, co. Clare, on whom the title was conferred in 1802. At the period of his decease he had just completed his seventy-eighth year. By Henrietta, his wife, eldest daughter of Sir John Morris, Bart., of Claremont, whom he married 20th June, 1803, he leaves a son, the present Sir Joseph Francis Peacocke, Bart., and one daughter, Eliza Anne. Through the mother, the deceased Baronet descended from the ancient family of Caffe, of Grange, county Kilkenny; and through his great grandmother, from the Ponsonbys, of Crotto.

DENIS MAHON, ESQ., OF STROKESTOWN, COUNTY ROSCOMMON.



THE barbarous murder of this unfortunate gentleman stands forth in dark relief, even among the atrocities which have of late years thrown so black a shadow over the domestic annals of Ireland. A good landlord, an upright magistrate, and a most active benefactor to the poor, Major Mahon has fallen a victim to the treacherous aim of the concealed assassin. Just two years since he succeeded, at the decease of his first cousin Maurice, Lord Hartland, to an estate of the value o £12,000 per annum, and fixed his residence at the family mansion of Strokestown, during his long and energetic the benefit of his tenantry, and the improvement of his land. Early in life he had served in the British Army, from which he retired with the rank of Major. He was born 12th March, 1787, the second son of the Rev. Thomas Mahon, younger brother of Maurice, first Lord Hartland; he married, 17th September, 1822, Henrietta, daughter of Dr. Bathurst, late Bishop of Norwich, by whom he leaves a son, Thomas, born 30th October, 1831, and a daughter, Grace Catherine. The family of Mahon was established in Ireland by Nicholas Mahon, Esq., a distinguished personage in the Civil Wars, and, from the period of its settlement, it has ever held a high position among the landed proprietors of the Sister Island, intermarrying with the most eminent houses, and frequently giving members to the Irish Parliament.

THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.—FROM THE PORTRAIT BY SIR THOMAS LAWRENCE.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

The Most Reverend Father in God, Edward (Venables Vernon) Harcourt, Lord Archbishop of York, Primate of England, was born on the 10th October, 1757. His Grace was the second son of George, first Lord Vernon, by his third wife, Martha, third daughter of the Hon. Simon Harcourt, and sister of Simon, first Earl of Harcourt. At the age of thirteen, he was sent to Westminster School, whence he removed to Christ Church, Oxford. Soon after taking orders, he was placed in the family Rectory of Sudbury. He was next appointed a Prebendary of Gloucester, and afterwards Canon of Christ Church, which appointments he retained for many years. In 1791, he became Bishop of Carlisle, and held that Bishopric up to 1807, when, on the death of the Most Rev. Dr. Markham, he was translated to the Archbishopric of York. In the following year, his Grace was made a Privy Councillor; he was also Lord High Almoner to the Queen, a Governor of the Charter House, and of King's College, London; Visitor of Queen's College, Oxford; a Commissioner for Building Churches, and a D.C.L.: he was also, for more than thirty years, one of the Directors of the Ancient Concerts.

This venerable Prelate was highly respected by all sects and parties. As a religious teacher, his precepts were clear and forcible; and they were fully supported by the practice of his life.

His Grace married, the 5th February, 1784, Anne, third daughter of Granville, first Marquis of Stafford, by whom (who died the 16th November, 1832) he had issue ten sons and four daughters, all of whom, except one daughter, survive him. Of these sons, three are dignitaries of the church; two are barristers and members of Parliament; two are colonels in the army; and two are captains in the navy. One daughter is married to Sir John V. B. Johnstone, Bart., M.P., and another is married to Col. Malcolm.

His Grace assumed the name of Harcourt in 1831, on inheriting the estates of the Harcourt family, on the death of Field-Marshal the Earl of Harcourt.

The Venerable Archbishop died, on the 5th instant, at the Palace, Bishopsthorpe, after a short illness, in his ninety-first year.

MENDELSSOHN.

Mendelssohn has shared the fate of Mozart and Bellini; he has died before the prime of life, in the fulness of his glory. This greatest of recent composers, whose death has caused a general lamentation, was born at Humburgh, on the 3rd Feb., 1809. His grandfather was an eminent Hebrew philosopher; his father was a wealthy merchant of Berlin. From his earliest youth Felix Mendelssohn Bartholdy was a musician. Educated pursuant to the anxious care and hope of a mother, by the first professors and masters of Germany, he, at eight years of age, played with marvellous execution and facility; in his ninth year, he performed publicly at Berlin.

His first published compositions appeared in 1824; and soon after that period he rose up to the eminence which he subsequently enjoyed. Need we enumerate his productions, familiar as they are to the delighted ear of Europe? Need we do more to register his fame than to mention that he was the author of the music of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," "Fingal," "Melusina," "St. Paul," and "Elijah?"

In this country Mendelssohn was a cherished favourite, and the affection was mutual: he loved England as heartily as his home. He had been frequently amongst us from the time of his gifted boyhood. His triumphant reception in London last spring now brings a melancholy feeling in its recollection.

On the 5th of last October, Mendelssohn was struck with apoplexy; and, although, as younger patients usually do, he struggled against the malady, it gradually overcame him, by frequent repetition, and he expired on the 4th instant, in his 39th year, thus bringing to an untimely termination a life graced by every private virtue, and illustrated by talents that class him among the greatest of his era.

THE LATE DR. FELIX MENDELSSOHN BARTHOLDY.

JULIA, COUNTESS CORNWALLIS.

This death of this estimable lady took place on the 4th instant, at St. Leonard's-on-Sea, after a lengthened illness, at the early age of thirty-seven. Her Ladyship was fourth daughter of Thomas Bacon, Esq., of Redlands, Berkshire, and became, on the 4th of August, 1842, the third wife of the present Earl Cornwallis, by whom she leaves an only child, the Lady Julia Mann Cornwallis, an infant of three years old.

CAVERN AND WATERFALL DISCOVERED IN YORKSHIRE.

In the limestone strata, which compose the bases of the mountains of Ingleborough and Penniginut, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, there are a number of frightful chasms, called Pots in the dialect of the district, most of them of an unknown depth, and generally the receptacle of some mountain stream. They are commonly so formed about their openings on the surface of the ground as to preclude the possibility of looking down them, or making a descent with any reasonable prospect of safety, even with the aid of ropes or ladders.

The descent into one of the largest of these gulfs has, however, lately been effected through a magnificent, and, as far as is known, hitherto unexplored cavern, by a party of the neighbouring gentry, consisting of Messrs. J. Birkbeck, W. Howson, and W. and T. Carr. The entrance into this cave is situated about 200 yards above Allan Pot, as the chasm is called, towards which it proceeds in a tortuous course, by gradual and occasionally abrupt descents, through vast chambers adorned with unmutilated groups of stalactite and stalagmite crystallizations, till it terminates at the edge of a precipice, from which may be descried, far above, the mouth of the Pot, and, 50 feet below, the apparent bottom. This precipice has been descended with tolerable ease by means of ladders taken through the cave, and with ropes. On proceeding forward under wide arches of overhanging rock, and after a further descent of 40 feet, the lowest accessible bottom is reached, and the view which we have engraved presents itself to the eye of the spectator. The height of the waterfall thus seen, as it falls almost noiselessly through the air, and without touching the sides of the rocks, is 120 feet, and it falls on, in the same perpendicular torrent, down another chasm, of depth of 180 feet. "The roar of waters" as the termination is barely heard, and the volumes of spray indistinctly seen in the yawning gulf.

ALLAN POT, NEAR SETTLE, YORKSHIRE.

It is to be hoped that this interesting spot, forming, as it does, so beautiful and imposing a picture as to defy the most faithful pencil to portray it adequately, may some time be rendered more accessible to the public than it now is.

SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

Our Illustration is taken from the new play of "John Savile of Haysted, by Mr. White, now being acted at Sadler's Wells Theatre. We gave the plot fully last week. The particular scene portrayed is that in which Lilian (Miss Laura Addison), having come to plead her father's cause to the Duke of Buckingham (Mr. H. Marston), discovers his dishonourable intentions. The play is published, and we quote a portion of the scene in question:—

Lilian. What words are these?
Buckingham. Of truth—of love.—I've heard from your own lips,
Your innocent, sweet praises of the Duke.
Your love for him, has won his love.—See here,
I am the Duke. The lordly Buckingham
Is at your feet.—Why is your look so cold?
Lilian. You will not spare my father.
Buckingham. How do you know
Lilian. For you've deceived me.
'Twas to win you, sweet.
Your father's fate is in your hands.
Lilian. My lord,—
I would be gone.—I waken from a dream;
I go.
Buckingham. Nay, nay—not yet.—What, is this all
I tell you, Lilian, I love you, dote on you.—
Nay, that my heart glows with so holy a flame,
I'll wed you.
Lilian. Let me go.—I will not plead
For more than license to depart.
Buckingham. How now?
Heard you I said I'd wed you?—I, the Duke?
Lilian. I heard you, Sir.—Rather in beggar weeds
Would I go forth an outcast thro' the world,
Than wed so mean a thing, as falsehood makes Buckingham. I warn you—these are not the words to soothe
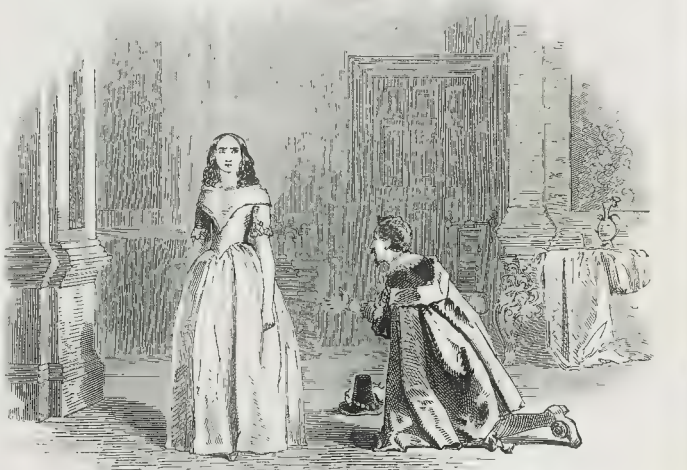
The wrath, that may consume your father's hopes.
Lilian. Sir!—Let me go.—Name not my father's name,
His honest name is not for lip like your's.
You warn me—take a warning back from me.
Rethink you of the gulf you stand on. Think
That a whole land heaps curses on your head,
And I—fond, dreaming, senseless, foolish girl,
To thank you pure and noble! Hear me now;
You've played the spy—the traitor, look on me,
I would not wed you—if, by saying the word,
I could win kingdoms—I shall seek my home,
If 'tis still left, and at my father's knees
Pray for God's help, since man's is useless.



SCENE FROM THE NEW PLAY OF "SAVILE OF HAYSTED," AT SADLER'S WELLS THEATRE.

THE PROFESSOR'S LADY.

BY BERTHOLD AUERBACH.

AUTHOR OF "VILLAGE TALES OF THE BLACK FOREST."

TRANSLATED BY MARY HOWITT

CHAPTER I.

TWO YOUNG FELLOWS ARRIVE.

THE Landlord of the Linden Tree sate at the garden window of his little parlour; he leaned his elbow on the window-sill, and propped his head on his hand. According to his custom he had planted his feet behind the front legs of his chair, as if he were about to take root there: for when he once seated himself it almost required a team of horses to hoist him up again.

But of a truth he sits there no longer; his head does not ache now; and yet the time was when his hand was never pain to many a one: there was a saying that whenever the Landlord of the Linden Tree gave anybody's head a blow, the hair never grew there again; and for that reason he was accustomed to deal his blows on the back of the neck; no blood flows thence, and yet the pain is all the acuter. What, then, was our Landlord a bully? You will soon learn that he was as mild and good-tempered as a lamb; but that was no reason why a fellow should not have a sound thrashing if he deserved it. To be brief, however, the Landlord of the Linden Tree was either a queer sort of a man, or not so, just as people took it.

So now, after this, we can sit down more composedly beside the Landlord; but we must make haste, for presently there will be a great commotion in the house, and in the whole village too, and all occasioned by one or two people.

The host of the Linden Tree sitting quietly, as we said, and letting his thoughts float about him, like the flies that were buzzing about in the parlour. To be sure, people have not a great many thoughts when they are tired, and, like the Landlord, have just come in from the field, where they have been loading a wagon of hay; the right thing in such a case is to take one's breath easily, and leave the thoughts, if one have any, to take care of themselves. He nodded, however, to the cat, which sate on the outer window-sill in a heap, and seemed to have a deal to do for herself; and then, turning himself round, he called out,

"Lorle."

A voice within the chamber replied "What?"

"I mean that, like the cat there, you are making as much to do about dressing as if we were going to have company."

"It is just so," replied the voice from within.

"Make haste and have done, and if you are cool, fetch me a drink of new wine out of the cellar. I am nearly choked with thirst."

"In a moment," replied the voice. A chest lid was heard to close; then somebody went down the steps and then came quickly up again; the door opened, and then—then the report of a gun shook the casement. A shrill cry escaped from the girl, the glass of new wine lay on the floor, and the cat sprang through the window into the room, almost close to the face of the Host. Instantly he started up with an imprecation, and the girl vanished through the half-open door.

But we must enquire after this strange occurrence.

Two young men walked through the mountain wood, one of them in a gray Tyrolese jacket, laced with green; he was tall and broad-chested, with a ruddy brown, unshorn beard, and a grey, pointed broad-brimmed hat, a good deal the worse for wear, on his head. The other wore a decent sort of hat, under which was a well-cut face and neatly-trimmed beard, and his small figure, somewhat bent forward, was dressed in a shabby, black great coat. The two walked on without a word. An old peasant followed them, carrying two knapsacks, a guitar, a camp-stool, and a gun. They at this moment emerge from the wood, and in the valley stretches itself out before them a long village, baked only on one side, as the saying is; because the houses stand along one side of the stream, which murmuring and wildly rushing over and amongst blocks of stone, rolled down the valley. A wooden bridge led across the stream to a lonely hill, on which stood the church.

"There you have it; that is Weissenbach," said the taller of the two, in a deeply-melodious voice.

"Ille terrarum mihi præter omnes angulus ridet," said the other, in whose black raiment we may justly recognise a worn-out scholar's coat.

"Have done with your 'Horace,'" returned the taller, to whom we may, without hesitation, appropriate the camp-stool.

"With all my heart," replied the other: and, looking round him, he continued with a smile, "Ite rursus est, your books shall not keep running in my way in the freedom of nature; be quiet with you. Here I will inhale fresh life. Look how peacefully the village lies extended in its mid-day slumber, as if it were some huge water-monster, that sunned itself on the banks of the stream; the thatched roofs are like great grey scales. See, there is the church! I love churches upon hills; they don't belong to the rubbish of houses. 'Upon this rock will I build my church.' How beautiful is the expression. And men must bodily ascend, to elevate themselves for spiritual worship. That church standing there on the mountain across the bridge, is actually transcendental, supernatural."

After a pause, he continued, "Did you hear the dogs barking and the Capitoline watchmen cackling? Do you hear the shouts of the children?—the good children!—They have no presentiment—not they—that you are in the way to immortalise their youth. Already has Virgil said, very beautifully, 'O fortunatos nimium, sua si bona norint, agricolas.' But the people here are like still life; they know not of the beauty of their existence; it is mere vegetating; and we come, Princes of the realms of mind, and transmute their confined world into fine thoughts and pictures."

"And who knows," replied the taller, "how the spirit of the world changes us, and by what thoughts and images we serve him?"

"You are more pious than you are aware of; that is a great thought," said the Learned Man; and the Painter continued, "Number A 1, now do not go and give to every thing which one utters a school-certificate."

The two dropped into silence; and the Painter, who feared that he had been too hard upon his companion, seized his hand, and said, "Here now we are going to stay; shake off from you all the dust of the schools, as you resolved to do: don't think, and don't wish, and you will have all you wish."

His friend replied with an inexpressibly kind look and pressure of the hand, and the Painter continued, "I must describe to you the man that we are going to stay with."

"No, do not! Let me find out his character," interrupted the other.

"Very good."

As they approached the village, the Painter struck into a footpath, that led to the back of the houses, and his friend remarked,

"There is a profound law, which causes natural roads never to keep perfectly right lines; the stream has an undulat ng, wavy course, and the roads leading from village to village pursue the same serpentine track along the plain. The philosophy of history may learn therefrom that neither man nor nature can ever be regulated by logic."

"With regard to roads, there is a very simple reason," remarked the Painter;" a carriage goes much more easily when, in consequence of a curve in the road, it acquires a swing; upon a perfectly straight and level road the harness presses equally, and wearies the horse. That is the philosophy of the driver."

With these words the two entered an orchard; and the Painter, taking the gun from the peasant, fired into the air, and then, shouting "Hurrah!" sprang up the steps and into the parlour.

And there are we also once more with the Landlord, at that very moment when the cat sprung in, close past his face, and the glass of new wine fell to the floor.

There stands the Landlord with both his fists clenched, and swears.

"Kreuz millionen hede quitak! what can it be? Who's in the——?"

"I am!" exclaimed the Painter, extending his hand for welcome.

The fist of the Host relaxed, and he exclaimed, "What! what! Yes, by Heaven. It is I. Ay, Mr. Reinhard, are you come again to see us? That is an unlooked for visit. We must light the stove."

"Because it is summer-time, old treasure-keeper," replied the Painter ,as he cordially shook the hand of the host, who now inquired,

"Was it you who fired in the garden just now?"

"No, not I," said the Painter, holding up the gun, "but my wife, who cannot keep her mouth shut."

"You are just as you used to be," said the Host; "but the husband must pay for the wife: there is a fine to be paid when any one shoots."

"I know it. I'll pay it willingly."

Reinhard introduced his friend Sub-Librarian Reihenmaier.

"Reihenmaier!" said the Host. "Then we have a relation here."

"There may be a distant relation of mine," returned the Sub-Librarian, smiling. "I, also, am descended from peasants."

"We are all descended from peasants," said the Host; "our old forefather, Adam, was a peasant."

"And where is your Eva, old Adam?" asked Reinhard.

"She will very soon be here with the hay-wagon. I came beforehand. Lorle! Lorle! where are you?"

"Here," answered a voice from below.

"Make haste, and set the barn door wide open, that the wagon may drive right in—there will be rain—and then come you here."

"The little greyling? I am curious to see the little greyling again," said Reinhard.

"Aha! mamilkin!" returned the Host, laughing waggishly, and threatening with his finger. "It is no longer the little greyling that you will see, but a blooming maiden. But, by heaven! you are not fit to be seen. You might be an old miner of Hauenstein. You have a whole forest on your face; red fire and copper brush. What does a load of it cost? Just tell me, do the tinkers and the scissors-grinders of the state wear such shaggy and unshorn beards? Don't they do with theirs as with books and newspapers?"

"Man! in heaven's name, man," interrupted the Painter, "are you beginning with these stories? Is one to have no rest from these cursed politics?"

"Yes, look now, it will not be otherwise; we strum peasants are not so simple but we can ask what becomes of our taxes, for what our sons must be soldiers so long, and——"

"I know it, I know it already," said Reinhard, warmly. The Sub-Librarian, however, seized the hand of the Landlord, clapped him on the shoulder, and said, "You are a right sort of man, a citizen of the future."

The Landlord shook himself, shrugged his shoulders, gazed at the Sub-Librarian with a wrinkled brow, and said, nodding the while with a smile, "My respects to you, and I thank you very much!"

The Sub-Librarian did not exactly know what to understand by that; but there was not much time for consideration, as the cracking of whips was heard and the Host betook himself to "the arbour" or covered balcony which, excepting on the garden-side, surrounded the house; the two strangers followed him.

"Drive steady! hauve!" cried the Host to the young man who sate upon the shaft-horse in the hay-wagon; "still more, hauve! else you will not get in, you'll never learn to drive all your days! So! so! Now it goes! Go on!" The wagon was safely landed within the barn; and, breathing more freely, every one returned to the parlour

The Sub-Librarian asked the reasonable question, "Why do you not have your barn-door made wider as it is so difficult to drive into it?"

The Host, who was looking out from the window, turned himself round, and, then gazing again into the open air, said aloud, "Young folks ought not to want better than what we are satisfied with. They should also learn to have their eyes about them, and know what comes after them. For more than thirty years I drove in there, and never stuck fast." Then, turning himself into the parlour, he continued, "What, then, may be your proper calling, Mr. Sublibrarian?"

"I am the keeper of a library," returned the young man.

Now came in the wife, the son, the female servant, and the man-servant. All welcomed Reinhard, and the wife remarked, pointing to the beard, "You are grown quite savage in these two years in which we have not seen you."

"Our Drum-Major," said Stephen, the son, "had such an outrageous beard as that, only every morning he blackened and polished its like a shoe."

"If I were a young girl you would not dare to kiss me with that beard," said Barbel, an aged, strong-jointed personage, who acted as female servant in the house, and who was mother to Martin, the man who stood behind her

"And I say," said Martin, "that the beard becomes him excellently; he looks like St. Joseph in the church."

"And you like the Moorish Prince," concluded the Host; "but where is Lorle all this time? Old woman, fetch me a drink out of the cellar, and give me a mouthful of cheese, and then you can get ready Mr. Reinhard's old chamber, and the other strange gentleman can sleep in the dancing-room."

The Landlord at last got his liquor; he would rather remain two hours parched by burning thirst, than go up and down two or three steps. The Sub-Librarian seated himself beside him.

Reinhard took a walk through the village; all the children ran after him, and some of the boldest of them shouted from behind corners—

Red fox, thy beard is blazing hot.
Water it well with a watering-pot!

Reinhard walked into the house where the surgeon-barber lived, and the children waited outside the door to see him come out again shaved; but when he re-appeared with his beard in full array, they laughed and shouted anew. In the house of the barber lived somebody else, and to him Reinhard had given a commission; this was the village-crier, who now came out with his bell. He rang his bell at all corners, and announced in a loud and distinct voice—

"The painter Reinhard has again arrived here, and has brought with him an immense red beard. This is to give notice that whoever wishes to see him should come to the Linden Tree, as there the show will be exhibited. Price of admittance, that every one makes a great mouth, and shows his teeth, if he have any. Feeding time at half-past eight. Children admitted free."

An incessant peal of laughter sang through the whole village; the children followed at the heels of the crier, laughing and shouting; it was hardly possible to bring them to silence, so that the proclamation might be heard

When evening came, and the sky was overcast with heavy rain-clouds, Reinhard sate upon the stone bench, under the linden tree before the public house; he laughed aloud to himself to think of the sudden mirth with which he had unexpectedly filled the minds of the villagers. Just then, he heard suppressed sobs somewhere near him, and, starting up, he saw a girl, who went towards the barn. "Lorle?" said he, in an enquiring tone.

"Thank God!" replied the girl, seizing the offered hand, but without looking up, or taking her apron from her face.

"Thou hast—" commenced the Painter in his old familiar style of addressing her: and then, correcting himself, he said, "You have been weeping, and for what?"

"I have not wept," returned the girl; and yet she could scarcely speak for sobs.

"Why will you not favour me with one little look?" said Reinhard. "Why not look at me; have I done any wrong to you?"

"No? rm, no."

"To whom then?"

"To yourself."

"Indeed, how so?"

"It displeased me," said the girl, "that you have made yourself a laughing-stock for the whole village; it is not right; and you have made fools of us also; that was not what we expected from you."

"You are grown tall and strong, Lorle," said the Painter; "come into the parlour, that I can have a look at you."

"There is no need for you to make any more of your jokes," said the girl, drawing herself up, and springing away from him through the gate towards the street.

Reinhard seated himself again upon the bench, with compressed lips and downcast eyes. That which had seemed to him the very moment before as only a merry and harmless joke, now appeared in quite a different form. From this point of view he thought—the child is right; there is a bit of aristocratic pride in this joke; we never know how much abominable haughtiness infects every one of us. I have been turning the whole village to ridicule.

The Sub-Librarian now came down and said to his friend, "A singular man is our host; I have had already to pass through a perfect examination. There is no end to his questions; and then there is something so suspicious about him."

"It is not that," returned Reinhard; "the peasants have an old saying, 'When a man eats with a new spoon, he should first of all breathe upon it three times. Do you understand?"

"Yes, perfectly; there is deep meaning in the idea."

"My respects to you, and I am very much obliged, Mr. ——, returned Reinhard, laughing.

Many men and young fellows of the village collected round the Linden Tree, and Reinhard was cordially welcomed by them all; the merry manner in which he had enticed them there had an ending in something so suspicious about him."

And there he went ashore without delay,
Having no Custom-house nor quarantine
To ask him awkward questions on the way
About the time and place where he had been.
BYRON

NOBODY, of course, ever before saw the lines prefixed to this paper, as they occur in an obscure epic entitled "Don Juan." It is proper, therefore, that we promise they relate to one Lambro, an elderly gentleman with a taste for the sea whose maritime residence was on one of the Cyclades. It needs only to have passed from Byron to Lambro, to be aware that his position was the beau ideal of the free and easy in aquatics. Such leave and licence of the high seas as appertained to our ancient mariner of the Archipelago is looked upon as the right and privilege of those who, by means of yachts or pleasure-yachtsmen, sail under a Royal Club burgee. Such is the conventional belief still genial: such was the fact which custom regarded as a law such is the case no longer. Justice! Who shall say that Justice is blind; blind, quotha! with one of Rosa's telescopes for an opera-glass. Snooks was black ball'd last season by "the Squadron:" Snooks will be at West Cowes all next summer and autumn, and will spend his days in front of the Club House, and when the master of my lord's yacht rises him from the Parade. Snooks will be there to watch the members of the Royal Yacht Squadron as they are turned inside out by the preventive service men. He will hear Lord A——— remark, to that effect, the member of his species is not recognised as to the contents of his hat; and Lord C——— requested to unfold that scarf of dazzling scarlet, wherewith he is wont to gird up his loins for the billow. Snooks, we say, will mark these matters "and shall be the wiser."

One of the oddest things in the world is the ready acquiescence people yield to any thing that everybody says. There used to be a natural history wonder, that no one could account for, but which was universally received and accredited . . "What do you say to a cat, weighing twelve ounces, after eating a pound of butter, being no heavier than before?" . . . . It was impossible to solve the mystery, "till some Paul Pry trod on the missing toe, and informed him of the actual sequences upon being chosen a member of any R. Y. C., is—to pay his entrance fee and his annual subscription. As these two items form the total, he will run no risk of the imputation of the grudging or the niggardly to which he is entitled But does he know to what extent he becomes socially disfra chised? No—he must be told. Example is better than precept. . .

In the course of the past season, a member of the principal Western Yacht Club —of eleven years standing, and who for those eleven years, no doubt, continued, in the ignorance which is bliss, to violate the law of the land, or rather of the water, upon every occasion of his going on board—entertained the point of Lilliputtan in his yacht, the Champagne name of evil augury! No sooner was he moored, than down came the Custom House—seized his vessel, and fined himself one hundred pounds. When the matter was represented to the Boards of Yacht Clubs as to stores. "Waste paper," replied the Bench. "I had only twenty-eight bottles of Cognac," urged Mr. Oliver. "You had no right to a thimbleful," rejoined the Justices, and they are right. By the Act 3 and 4 Victoria, cap 87—no vessel under sixty tons is entitled to have a vial of foreign spirits or a ty kind on board nor vessels of any tonnage in quantities under twenty gallons!... So that the Act has got in force against pleasure craft, what a heavy blow and great dis.ouragement it will be to the sports of the amateur sailor!

But, whatever the Board of Customs may choose to do, it is fitting every owner of a yacht should know that he is as amenable to the Excise Laws as the skipper of a billy-b y, and as legally liable to the forfeiture of his craft on any infringement of them as though he never heeded a Club burgee. Was this understood in its true application before, or did the members of Yacht Clubs feel secure in the impression of a conventional lumnun ty which the authorities at the Custom House would not or dare not enforce? We believe the latter to be the fact, and have thus written to them:—"AVE AT CAVE."

* The Champagne is a yacht of 17 tons, and her owner possesses also the complement of strong waters will stand him in four hundred pounds—when all is over.

H. HARBERT.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

The tendency to improvement perceptible last week continues, and a gradual relaxation on the part of the bankers and discount brokers is a sure proof that confidence is returning. The eminent discount house of Messrs. Overend, Gurney, and Co. have intimated that 5 per cent. is their maximum allowance on money "at call." Good bills have been done at the rate of 6 per cent., and first-class paper at 5½ per cent. On the Stock Exchange money is a drug, and for short dates will only bring a nominal 4 per cent. This striking change in the position of affairs is solely attributable to returning confidence, and not to any extended issue on the part of the Bank of England. Up to the date of the last return, no application of the additional powers granted by Government had been necessary, and every day lessens the probability of such an act. The notes in the banking department, had only decreased £370,530, and the gold and silver £37,265, leaving £1,176,740 in notes, and £429,384 in gold, to be exhausted ere the necessity for an indemnity exists. It remains for those who advocate an increase in the quantity of money in circulation to point out the benefit to the community, five per cent. is just attainable. It is, and has been, demonstrated that cash has failed, and not the quantity of money. The greater the quantity of paper money in circulation, the more frequently will periodical panics occur. It is constant tendency to create a gold and a paper price for all commodities. A few weeks of increasing confidence, leading as it must to the gradual resumption of ordinary trade operations, will soon remove the panic mind. Current discussions will then be confined to the Houses of Parliament, and the advocates of "inconvertibility" will have some difficulty in finding an audience willing to listen to dry, wordy, and impracticable theories.

A meeting of the creditors of Laurence Phillips and Sons was held on Tuesday. The assets of the firm presented a large surplus. Lengthy explanations were entered into with a view of clearly representing the condition of the houses in connexion with its correspondents, Vinay, Cardoza, and Co., of Madras; and Lanoe, Matheus, and Co., of Colombo, both of which establishments, it was asserted, would pay a handsome profit. Several questions concerning the accounts were put upon them. With respect to the Madras firm, it was mentioned that the last advices received from them were to the effect that produce was lying on the coast ready for shipment to the extent of £1,000, but the despatch of which was only delayed by the absence of available tonnage. Although it seemed not to be considered probable that the creditors would have to come upon the coffee plantations held by the insolvent estate, it was clear that property, and one that was likely to increase in value as its cultivation progressed. The "unavailables" realisable within the next three months, and calculated to produce between £20,000 and £22,000, will constitute the means for a handsome distribution shortly. In the course of discussion, a recommendation was made to employ the bills on the Indian connections of the house not to press their claims hurriedly, lest premature embarrassment should be occasioned. As it appeared to be the unanimous wish of the meeting, it was agreed that the proposal should be allowed to legislate under an inspectorship, composed of the chairman, Mr. E. H. Palmer, of the firm of Palmer, Mackillop, and Co., and Mr. David Hass

We are glad to state that Messrs. Boyds and Thomas have been enabled to resume business. The trade of the house is chiefly with Ceylon, and the character of the firm warranted the hope that their difficulties might speedily be surmounted.

Messrs Ryder, Wienholt, and Co., East India merchants, whose firm has been established only two or three years, have suspended to-day, in consequence of their recent remittances having been mostly on failed houses. The liabilities amount to about £50,000 or £60,000

As meetings of the principal firms who suspended payment during the late wave of confidence have now been held, they will afford some guide as to how far a system of bolstering was either merited, or likely to be of permanent benefit. The number of firms amount to twenty, and the aggregate liabilities £4,586,264, being an average of £229,4 1 for each firm. An average dividend of 13s. 6d. is the result. The various dividends consist of one 4s. 3d., in the £1; one of 8s.; one of 8s. 8d.; one of 9s.; one of 9s. 8d.; one of 9s. 8d.; two of 11s.; one of 11s. 6d.; two of 12s.; one of 12s. 6d.; one of 13s.; and one from 7s. to 10s. The French loan has been taken at Paris at 75f. 2c.

Monday was comparatively tranquil in the English Market, Consols opening at 81¾ to ⅞, but with an improvement in nearly all the closing prices of Saturday. Advancing to 82, after some fluctuations a reaction closed prices at 81⅞ for Money, with a firm market. A further improvement on Tuesday took place on opening, after which quietness succeeded, and was fairly maintained. The closing figures were 84¼ to ½. The public coming in for Money Stock was the principal cause of this improvement. This upward tendency predominated on Wednesday. Consols opening at 84¼ to ⅜ for Money, but sales to realise in speculative purchases, checked further advances, and an intimate reaction left quotations at 84 sellers for Money and Time. A comparatively steady market on Thursday, last quotations at 84¾ for Money and Exchequer Bills at par to 4 dis. The rise in the value of these securities has been continuous and rapid. On Monday the quotation was 15 to 14 dis., now it is par. Bank Stock has not advanced proportionately, and closes at 184. SATURDAY MORNING.—The announcement of the French loan did not have much effect upon the Market yesterday, which remained steady, Consols closing at 84⅞ to ¾ for Money, and 84⅝ to ¾ for Time. In the Foreign Market there was scarcely any business; and Shares were generally heavier, with little doing

A ROMAN CATHOLIC PROCESSION.—The city of Cambray (says Galignani) has just been the theatre of a procession, the like of which has probably not been seen for a long time in any town. It consisted of the triumphal entry of Cardinal Giraud on his return to his episcopal see of Cambray, after the obligatory visit to Rome. The order observed in the march of the cortege, which passed in the following order, amidst the ringing of bells and the roaring of artillery:—A picket of dragoons, the Swiss; the altar boys; two acolytes of the cathedral; the girls of the hospital in ranks of ten, preceded by their banner; the Sisters of Charity; 100 little girls of the school of the Sisters, clothed in white, preceded by their banner, and conducted by their governess; the pupils of the ecclesiastical foundation of Vender-Buen, preceded by a flag, and chanting a hymn composed for the ceremony; the Sisters of St. Julien; 100 pupils of the Ecole des Frères; the drummers of the infantry of the line; the band of the corps; the collegiate canons in plaicons; the banner of the little seminary and the pupils of the establishment; the cross of the great seminary; priests not attired in cochets; the banner of the parish of St. Gery; the banner of the parish of St. Aubert; priests and veiled in ranks of five, the drummers of the National Guard; seminarists bearing incense and holy-water; gold cross of the cathedral; children of the choir; band of the Dragoons; carpets of the two parishes of the city; the collegiate canons; and priests wearing the rochet; banner of the cathedral; young ladies, tastefully dressed in white and veiled, belonging to the parish; band of the firemen; band of the National Guard; five choristers in gold scarves; the collegiate canons; a seminarist bearing the Cardinal's hat; the officers of his Eminence bearing the arms; the two assistant prie-dieu archdeacons in red copes, the canopy borne by six seminarists in red dalmatics, and six others in white and violet to replace them; his Eminence walking under the canopy; two seminarists holding the trains of the cope; the vicars of the cathedral under the canopy; the authorities of the city; the state carriage, drawn by four horses, containing the Cardinal's pocket of dragoons. On his entrance to the Cathedral his Eminence chanted a Te Deum, which was repeated by 300 or 600 priests. In the evening there was an illumination and a display of fireworks.

A sum of money has been remitted to Portsmouth by the Company of Proprietors of the Great Britain steam-ship, in liquidation of the claims of the riggers belonging to that dockyard and Plymouth who were employed in getting her off the shore in Dundrum Bay; but, as it was not equal to their legal allowance, and would not have divided more than 30s. per man, a letter has been written to the Company, stating what ought to be paid, and, in the meantime, the matter stands over for the present.

THE KAFFIR WAR.

Sandilla, the Chief of the tribes of Kaffirs with whom we have been so long at war, was formally declared a Rebel by a proclamation, issued by Sir H. Pottinger, on the 27th of August. The immediate cause of this step is Sandilla's refusal "to deliver up a thief who had stolen thirteen goats from the settlement of Stockenstrom (Kat River), and of whom he (Sandilla) denied all knowledge at a moment when it was positively ascertained that, not only had he the culprit in his power, but that he had plundered him and other (innocent) persons belonging to the same kraal of the whole of their property, on the plea of punishing them for the said theft." This refusal led to a skirmish, in which two English subjects were killed; the act of resistance of course made Sandilla a rebel. The proclamation, having described at length this act of violence itself, and recapitulated the fruitless exertions made by the Governor to bring Sandi la to submission by pacific means, says:—

"I do, therefore, hereby proclaim the said Gaika Kaffir Chief Sandilla to be a rebel, and denounce him as no longer under the protection of her Majesty's Government; and I do further hereby invite and call upon all classes and conditions of persons residing in this Colony to be aiding and abetting in carrying my intended measure against the said rebel Chief into effect, by assembling in commandos, to be headed by leaders appointed by themselves, at Shiloh, on the — day of the ensuing month of September, and thence to enter, supported by her Majesty's regular troops and the Colonial native levies, the country of the said Sandila.

"And I do hereby further proclaim and promise, as an inducement to all persons to come forward, that all cattle and other booty captured by such commandos, belonging to, or found within, the country of the said Sandila, or any others who may take part with him, shall become the bond fide property of, and be retained by, the captors, and that no claim shall hereafter be made on the part of Government, or on any other pretence, for an account of, or the restoration or relinquishment of, cattle or other property so captured."

The chiefs Gaika, T'Slambie, and Tambookie Kaffir chiefs, the Bushman Madoor, and their followers, who have declared their wish and intention to remain neutral, and to abide by their engagements during the approaching hostilities, are, by the same proclamation, placed under the protection of the British Government.

The measure is warmly approved by the settlers of the Colony, as it will bring matters to a crisis. In a letter from Graham's Town, dated 31st August, the following statement appears:—"Sir Henry Pottinger's proclamation of Sandilla, the Gaika Kaffir chief, as a rebel, is dated the 27th of August, and the attack on his stronghold in the Amatola will take place about the 20th or 21st of September, in three columns of about 700 each, under Lieutenant-Colonel Campbell (91st Regiment), from Fort Hare, the rendezvous being Fort White; the irregulars or Fingoes and Hottentots, co-operating as auxiliaries from the north of the Amatola, near Shiloh, under Capt. Hogg (7th Dragoon Guards), Major Sutton (Cape Corps), and Capt.-Commandant Melville, a colonist. Major Rumley (6th Foot) commands the reserve on the Buffalo line; Lieutenant-Colonel Johnstone, of the 27th, and Lieutenant-Colonel Lindsay, of the 91st, remain in Graham's Town, the former as Commandant. The High Commissioner and the Lieutenant-Governor are here at present. General Sir George Berkeley proceeds next week to the front, King William's Town, thence to Fort White; his staff, Mackinnon, Storks, Seymour, and his son, are all of the right sort, and I believe the work will be well done. Macomo and Umhalla, Caffre chiefs, remain faithful, and, with other friendly Kaffirs, will seclude themselves in the valley of the Chumie during our operations against Sandilla; and, if the Tambookies continue neuter, and if Pato and Creili do not give the slip to the military on the Buffalo, the colony will remain free from a retaliatory invasion. Everything will, however, depend on our success against Sandilla; failure would raise a host of savage foes; but, be they few or many, it is impossible that we can longer submit to hold our safety and peace on the tolerance and forbearance of capricious savages; until they are humbled and feel our power, we can do nothing for their good or our own."

The above Portrait of Sandilla is from a drawing lately received from Cape Town: he is also denominated "the Withered Leg," from the physical defect, which we have shown in the Portrait.

THE EXCHANGE BUILDINGS, LIVERPOOL.

Liverpool is, during the present commercial crisis, a point on which public interest is powerfully concentrated. The locality shown in our Illustration is, in connexion with the above circumstance, perhaps, the most important site in this important town; the rapidity of whose rise is exemplified in the fact, that, since the beginning of the eighteenth century, Liverpool has increased in population fifty-fold, or from five thousand inhabitants to more than a quarter of a million.

The ancient meeting-place of the merchants and traders of Liverpool was at the Market-place, around the High-cross, at the junction of the four principal streets of the town. This Cross was removed in 1674, and a public Exchange erected upon the spot. This was, after some years, taken down, and a building on a larger scale constructed. In 1795, this edifice was destroyed by fire; and, until 1803, Liverpool was without an Exchange.

In the latter year, the first stone of the present extensive buildings was laid. In the "Stranger in Liverpool," the whole is stated to have been built under the direction of John Foster, Esq., from the designs of James Wyatt, Esq. The material is stone, of reddish hue, from the quarries of the Earl of Sefton, in Toxteth Park.

The edifice occupies three sides of a quadrangle, 194 feet by 180 feet, the area being 3492 feet, or twice of the late Royal Exchange, London. The plan has three interior facades; "two of which," says the "Picturesque Handbook of Liverpool," "on the east and west sides, are surrounded by a range of columns with Corinthian capitals, supporting a massy cornice and balustrade, and covering arched piazzas of 15 feet in width, extending along each of the facades. The north side offers a projected centre, with a portico of duplicated columns, through which the road passes out of the quadrangle into the adjoining street. Surmounting the columns is an entablature, supporting four sculptured figures of the elements, and corresponding with emblematic figures representing the four quarters of the world, placed on the Town Hall, which building forms the south side of the square. In the east wing of the building is a spacious news-room, and a corresponding room immediately above it is appropriated to the use of the underwriters. In the centre of the extensive area formed by these buildings, is placed Lord Nelson's Monument. This tribute to the memory of one of England's noblest heroes, was modelled and cast from the designs of Matthew Charles Wyatt, by the celebrated Westmacott. It was erected in the year 1813, at an expense of £9000, raised by public subscription; and the bronze consumed in its construction alone weighs twenty-two tons."

The Figures at the base of the pedestal are of heroic size; and the grateful people of Liverpool have not left the pedestal bare, but have placed on its sides bronze bas-reliefs of some of the great naval actions in which Nelson was engaged. The figures constituting the principal design, are Nelson, Victory, and Death; his country mourning for her loss, and her navy eager to avenge it, naturally claim a place in the group. The principal figure is the Admiral, resting one foot on a conquered enemy, and the other on a cannon. With an eye steadfast and upraised to Victory, he is receiving from her a fourth naval crown upon his sword; which, to indicate the loss of his right arm, is held in his left hand.

International Copyright.—The London Gazette of Tuesday night contains a proclamation announcing that her Majesty in Council was pleased to declare that the provisions of the International Copyright Act (7 and 8 Vict.) shall be extended to the works of all authors, engravers, designers, musical composers, &c., first published within the kingdom of Hanover, for the full term of the privileges of copyright which authors of books, engravings, dramatic pieces, and music, natives of the United Kingdom, may enjoy in the kingdom of Hanover, until the treaty recently entered into on this matter has been concluded.

Lord Ashley.—The noble Lord has written to the journals denying, in the most emphatic language, the existence of any truth in the rumour recently published, to the effect that his Lordship had made a demand on his election committee at Bath for £87 for travelling expenses, and that the same, "after some boggling," had been paid by the committee.

Sir John Franklin's Expedition.—It is said, on good authority, that in the event of nothing being heard of Sir John Franklin and his gallant polar voyagers next year, the Government will fit out three separate expeditions very early, to be despatched different routes in quest of them. The Admiralty still feel no reason to be alarmed for the safety of the gallant hero and his companions; for they do not expect to hear from them until next year.

Abatement of the Railway Mania.—The present is the period of the year when it is required that notices should be given of all applications to Parliament for new railway bills, &c.; the ruinous mania has, however, received an effectual check. Not one new railway scheme is to be applied for, while last year the journals contained 90 parliamentary notices from railway companies, and six of other projects; and, in 1845, 78 parliamentary notices of new railway undertakings, and eight of other projects.

THE SESSION.

SPECULATION is naturally excited by the opening of the first Session of a New Parliament, some time before the usual period of assembling that body, to the course and objects of its future legislation. But, the old guides that served for the "votes" of party in by-gone times, are no longer of any avail. The country has returned a House of Commons, less distinctively marked by old party divisions, than any that has sat for the present century. According to the best analyses, it would seem that fewer landowners have been elected; fewer Naval and Military officers have been chosen; and, by that diminution, it may be taken for granted, that the Aristocracy have lost weight in the Lower House; for the officers of both services, who were generally returned, had political "connections." Fewer Lawyers, too, have found favour in the eyes of the people; for which, heavy Parliamentary fees, extracted from the pockets of shareholders, may perhaps account: individuals presenting themselves for the suffrages of the electors, have been visited with the unpopularity attaching to a class. More members of the existing Government have failed in their re-election, than on any former occasion, when they had other qualities besides position to recommend them. Indeed, the "free and independent" have acted with an unusual amount of the qualities described by those adjectives; in some cases, they shook themselves free of all gratitude for past services, and acted quite independently of the motives that usually influence a choice. But, as personal reasons were largely mixed up with the Election proceedings of Bath, Edinburgh, and Lambeth, it may be that the political results will be less mischievous than was at first anticipated. The present consequence is that, till the new men become, in some degree, old ones, political calculations are a little deranged.

What the Land, the Aristocracy, and the Professions have lost, has been gained by Trade, Commerce, and our own craft—Journalism. There are more Bankers, more Traders, Merchants, Railway Directors, and Newspaper Editors, in this Parliament, than ever before found entrance there. Men of business are more numerous; practicality predominates; physical and material interests are getting the advantage of theory, that might be right or wrong; and of party, which the family nominees of both sides stuck to, whether wrong or right. The change will not be unproductive of results.

For instance, there is now some chance of a little mercantile coolness and common sense being brought to bear on matters that have, thus far, defied all the efforts of what is called the "wisdom of our Statesmen," which will often turn out on examination to have been something as little like wisdom as can well be imagined.

We cannot, for instance, deny ourselves the pleasure of anticipating that Ireland, the "great difficulty" of our greatest men for the last half-century, will now be dealt with by a policy not exclusively one of tradition. The House of Commons, being now beyond the complete control of either of the chiefs of the two great parties, may insist on their both stepping a little out of the old routine. All our Ministries, thus far, have been mostly composed, and always headed, by the representatives of one of the "great families," to whom political power fell almost as an inheritance: the career of Canning is only a passing exception. The Chathams, the Rockinghams, the Grenvilles, the Foxes, the Liverpools; in later days, the Huskissons, the Peels, the Russells, have had all the ruling power of England in their hands; and Ireland has baffled all of them, sinking from bad to worse continually, whoever governed. Ejections—a famine—a subscription in England to support the sufferers—assassinations, agrarian outrages, and robberies of arms—all these have marked the history of Ireland, from the middle of the last century to the present hour. The remedies, like the evils, were equally applied in one unvarying succession. Whig and Tory prescribers had but one drug in their stock—Coercion. The forms in which this was administered were varied almost to infinity: Martial Law—Suspensions of the Habeas Corpus—Whiteboy Acts—Arms Acts—Registry of Arms—every shape popular violence assumed, had a corresponding Coercive Act to meet it. One terror was fought by another; there was compelled peace for a time; the symptoms were repressed, but the disease was as active as ever, having only been driven inward to rage unseen. Never was a policy longer, more perseveringly, more thoroughly tried, than that of Coercion; and, yet, here we are, in the winter of 1847, after a year of worse famine than Ireland ever saw; after an expenditure of ten millions, merely in keeping the people alive; with a New Parliament in the meeting, a Whig Ministry in office; —and the first thing to be asked for is, a Coercion Bill; and, for all that appears, nothing else worth the name of a measure.

The worst effect of this policy is that it appears to be action, when really it is only preparing the way to act. But all parties, struck with horror at the case the Government can always make out for Coercion, unite in putting whole counties out of the pale of the Constitution; where that is done they separate again and quarrel about what is to be done next.

It is time this continual grinding in the old mill should cease; we must be delivered from the curse of tradition and routine, or we shall perish. And it is because it gives a chance of Ireland being governed for its social and physical welfare, not for the political supremacy of any party, that we are glad to see the new Parliament contains fewer back politicians, and more men of business. "Sound political principles"—all the constitutional watchword of the hustings, have swayed long enough; they have landed us in a state of things, the like of which is not to be seen elsewhere in Europe. Let us try what a little mercantile talent can do for our neglected and ruinous inheritance. Let the unpolitical party in Parliament insist on a bold, original, and creative policy, pressing it regardless who it may throw out, or place in. Surely the human intellect is capable of something more than for ever copying and repeating the Coercion Acts of these past fifty years! The Ministry will make a strong plea for "greater powers," and the Home Secretary is unhappily furnished with a list of atrocities that makes opposition to the request impossible; with Murder walking the land at daylight, the natural impulse is to stop it at any risk. But experience has also shown the danger there is in a Government sitting down content with discharging the constable's office, persuaded, indeed, that it has no other to discharge: it is the smallest part of the duty of a ruler in a country so situated as Ireland. England will not and cannot continue fighting a famine with gold, where there is "much land and fertile," and the people to grow corn on it, if a fair share of the fruits of the earth were secured to them—and security.

The new Coercion Act, with greater or less powers than its many predecessors, will doubtless be passed by the new Parliament. The daily accounts from Ireland are too full of horrors for any one effectually to oppose that obvious expedient at which every Government grasps. The declaration of Mr. John O'Connell, that he will "die on the floor of the House," before he will allow it to pass, we do not rate at much; we have heard the same declaration often, and always saw it end in the solitary patriot surviving in good health many years after the law he denounced became part of the Statute Book. A Coercion Bill will pass; but we do urge the independent members of the House to enforce on the Government, of whichever party it may consist, the necessity of doing something more than this—something different. It is impossible that an island part of the Empire can go on, only at intervals governed by the Constitution; exceptions are dangerous; force is the rough and ready instrument of rulers who want the courage or the originality of thought to strike out a policy adapted to the emergencies. Disorganised, demoralised, as the social state of Ireland is in many districts, we do not believe it is beyond the reach of real, thorough, searching legislation. When transferred to America, the Irish cotter does not shout the landowner, or his neighbour of his own grade in life. But if in Ireland the old system is continued—of inaction in everything except putting the country out of the pale of the law—then this dreadful, this anomalous social state, will continue to shock every humane and Christian feeling, and be our disgrace in the eyes of the world.

Politicians by birth have had a long trial; let us now try the men of business, whom the tide of public opinion has placed into power. There are among them men who conduct establishments equal in importance to many kingdoms, who are the chiefs of systems of extreme intricacy. There are among them merchants who form a Board-room in Leadenhall-street, rule millions at a distance of thousands of miles with a fair amount of justice, and their sway is more popular and successful than that of our colonial office, the governing of which is one of the opprobria of England. Bowing this energy and talent to exist among us, shall we despair? No; the only thing wanted is determination and courage to strike into a path diverging from the old rule of routine in which our Governments have for ages perseveringly and most unsuccessfully rolled along.

THE KING OF SARDINIA AT GENOA.

THIS spirited Portrait-Sketch shows one of the several enthusiastic demonstrations in favour of the late popular measures adopted by the King of Sardinia.

Our Artist's letter states that the King arrived at Genoa, from Turin, on the 4th inst. This was soon known throughout the city, and nothing was heard but shouts of "Viva Carlo Alberto Riformatore!" "Viva l'Italia," &c. On reaching the Palace, his Majesty halted, surrounded by his staff of officers: the troops then passed before him, and then came a procession of citizens, shouting "Viva Carlo Alberto," &c. The crowd was very great: it comprised every grade of the people, including a great number of women, veiled; Priests, Monks, and Genoese sailors. The weather was very fine, and quite hot.

On the previous day, the 3rd, there was a magnificent Fête at Turin. The Carignan Theatre was the scene of this demonstration. "Long before the time announced for the rising of the curtain," the Theatre was metamorphosed into a vast and magnificent assemblage of ladies, of flowers, and of diamonds; the élite of the society of Turin was grouped in boxes splendidly lighted, whilst the young men occupying the pit presided by cries of 'Long live Charles Albert!' the fine singing. The Piedmontese, Genoese, and Savoyard flags floated above a great number of boxes, and the blue rosette was displayed on every breast. The curtain rose at seven o'clock, to an immense cry of 'Long life to the King!' and the orchestra commenced the beautiful overture to 'La Semiramide;' but scarcely was it terminated, when the pit rose en masse, and exacted the immediate execution of the hymn, which was only to have been sung at the end of the second act. The manager appeared, and announced that the singers, complying with the just impatience of the spectators, would proceed to satisfy them. During the preparations the spectators themselves chanted the cantata of the morning, and repeated it until the curtain rose, and displayed 100 singers. A triple salvo of cheers and three acclamations of 'Long live the King!' saluted this singing army, which was interrupted at each strophe by the cries of frantic joy. The beautiful hymn of the poet Cargnoli, set to music by the maestro Gaetano Magazzari, was repeated eight times, and was only interrupted by the ballet, the only part of the programme which could be performed. At one moment, all the ladies, having risen in their boxes, formed with their white scarfs a quadrille of union, which, at each, starting from the two extremities, met at the centre; and a thousand voices cried, 'Long live our brethren of Genoa!' 'Long live our brethren of Savoy and of Nice!' 'Long live the children of Charles Albert!' It was really a single family of brethren who fêted on that evening the chief of the State, Charles Albert, who had just, said they, joined the sceptre of love to that of authority."

On the 3rd, there was at Florence, a similar manifestation in favour of King Charles Albert. An immense crowd congregated before the hotel of the Marquis de Carrega, the Sardinian Minister, crying, "Viva Charles Albert, Pius IX., the Independence of Italy, and the Commercial League." M. Carrega presented himself at the balcony, and thanked the people; but, having no Sardinian flag to hoist, he unfurled that of Tuscany amidst deafening cheers

At Bologna, rejoicings took place on the 4th inst., to celebrate the reforms granted by the King to his subjects.

On the 8th, Nice, which had hitherto been but little excited by political events, caught the enthusiasm. In the evening, when the Governor entered the Louges, all the spectators rose, and unanimously raised a cry of "Long live Charles Albert! Long live Pius IX.! Reform for ever!" A hymn in honour of the King, composed by Mademoiselle Lasserno, was chanted on the stage, and received with immense applause.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL INTELLIGENCE.

FRANCE.

A highly important resolution was adopted by the Council-General of Paris on Friday last, by a majority of 25 to 20. It is to the following effect:—"Whereas an experience of 16 years has disclosed serious imperfections in the electoral law of the 19th of April, 1831, and demonstrated the necessity and urgency of modifying several of its enactments; the Council expresses a wish that the Government and the Chambers should attend with solicitude to the revision of that law at the next legislative session.

The French journals publish a Customs league between Sardinia, Tuscany, and the Papal States, and agree in regarding it as the foundation of a political union. One of the objects of the treaty is to maintain and promote the dignity and prosperity of Italy. Even in a commercial sense it is of importance, as it will, if fully carried out, establish an uniform system of trade, and remove many of the existing annoyances to merchants and travellers. The treaty states, that the King of Naples and the Duke of Modena have been requested to join the league, but there is no mention of the Duchess of Parma which is remarkable; for without the co-operation of Modena and Parma there can be no communication between Piedmont and the Papal States and Tuscany.

The French and Belgian Governments have agreed to a reduction of the rate of postage between the two countries. By the new arrangement France is divided into two zones. The first extends only to Amiens, the postage of which, to and from, is fixed at 40 centimes for the smallest weight; the second comprises Paris, Marseilles, and the greater part of France, and the postage is fixed at 70 centimes, being a reduction of only 20 centimes upon the former rate.

Reform dinners, on which so much has been said, are daily becoming more frequent in France. The National announces "a grand Reform Banquet" at Montargis, which is to be presided over by certainly one of the senior Reformers of Europe, General Arthur O'Connor, "who is now, we are told, in his 84th year, but lively and eloquent as when a member of the Irish House of Commons more than half a century ago."

SUICIDE OF COUNT BRESSON.—The Siècle publishes a letter from Naples of the 3rd, which states, that as soon as this melancholy event was known, the Minister of Police went to the embassy and demanded all the papers of the deceased, in order that he might be able to institute an inquiry into the circumstances connected with the murder. The Secretary of Legation replied, that there had been no murder, but a suicide; and that he could not permit the papers of the late Ambassador to be removed on any pretext whatever. The Minister, however, would not place credit in the assertion respecting suicide—M. Bresson having, he said, been too religious a man to commit such an act; and he insisted on having the papers for the purpose of entering upon a judicial investigation. The Secretary of Legation, thinking that the only object of the Minister was to become acquainted with the secret instructions given by M. Guizot to M. Bresson, remained firm, and the Minister was at length compelled to retire without his expected booty.

The Gazette du Midi says—"Count Bresson died the victim of the Spanish marriages. He had been the instrument of a policy of mystification towards the King of Naples. He could not support the severe expressions with which he was received; and, seeing his mission defeated, and the future compromised, he did not wish to live any longer." The Magellan steam frigate arrived, on the 11th, at Marseilles, from Naples, with the remains of Count Bresson on board. The body of the Count was disembarked in the evening, and placed in a room of the Hotel de l'Orient, arranged as a chapelle ardente.

M. Mariano, chef de section on the Marseilles to Avignon Railway, was found, on the morning of the 9th instant, murdered in a ravine close to the line. It is supposed that he was first fired on and struck in the face, and then beaten with sticks and stones until dead. Nothing has yet been discovered of the murderers, but it is supposed that revenge was the motive which actuated them.

SPAIN.

The Marquis de Miraflores has been appointed President of the Senate, and the Duke de Gor and the Prince d'Anglona Vice-Presidents of that assembly. The Queen has accepted the resignation of M. Lopez de la Torre Aylien, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of Spain at Lisbon, and named as his successor General Ros de Olano, former Minister of Commerce and Public Instruction. Her Majesty has conferred on General Cordova the Grand Cross of the Royal and Noble Order of Charles III.

The sudden arrival of General Pavia, and the dismissal of General Concha from the post of Captain-General of Catalonia, had produced a deep sensation in Barcelona.

PORTUGAL.

Advices to the 9th inst. from Lisbon, mention that the Ministerial crisis still continued, though on more than one occasion it appeared to have been terminated by the appointment of a Liberal Cabinet. Financial difficulties are the main impediment, and that obstacle, as 5,000 sovereigns were expected from Brazil, would be removed. A few chiefs of the Liberal party had paid their respects at the Palace.

The Queen had been delivered of a Prince on the 4th inst. Her Majesty had attended the Italian Opera the previous night, and remained till eleven o'clock. The British fleet was anchored off Packet Stairs.

SWITZERLAND.

Hostilities have at last really commenced. According to the latest advices the French Government have received information of the surrender of Fribourg, after a sanguinary conflict, in which it has been almost the universal custom to re-elect, for a second year, at least, the Lord Rector of the year immediately preceding. Lord John was elected in 1846, when he was unsuccessfully opposed by Mr. Wordsworth. The votes are polled by nations, and out of the four which compose the University elective body, viz.:—Loudonians, Glottians, Transfurthians, and Rothesians, there were three in favour of Mr. Murc; the respective majorities in all except the first-named, being 11, 11 and 19; and the aggregate of votes:—Mure, 240; Russell, 225. Mr. Mure has, therefore, been elected by a majority of nations as well as separate votes.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.—The Lord Bishop of London has collated the Rev. Thomas Robinson, D.D., Professor of Arabic in the University of Cambridge, and Master of the Temple (formerly Archdeacon of Madras), to the prebendal stall of Mora, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul, the appointment having been rendered vacant by the death of the Venerable Joseph Holden Pott, M.A., late Archdeacon of Middlesex.

THE Rectory of Clapham, Surrey (diocese of Winchester), vacant by the death of the Venerable Archdeacon Dealtry, D.D., has been conferred on the Rev. T. B. Bowyer, M.A.; patron, W. B. Atkins, Esq.

HISTORIC TREASURES.—Some valuable inedited and hitherto unknown letters of Queen Elizabeth to James VI. of Scotland—written between the years 1581 and 1594, and relative to the Armada, Babington's Conspiracy, the trial of Mary Queen of Scots, and other public events—have lately been placed at the disposal of the Camden Society for the purpose of publication, and will be put to press immediately.

FORGERIES OF THE 250*l.* NOTES of the Bank of Lyons have been made, but so so clumsily that they may be easily detected. They are printed on a sheet of white paper, on which a greasy substance has been passed to make the paper transparent. Of a genuine note, the name of "Banque Générale" is "Banque Comptoir France," and "Bank de Lyon," disappear when the note is held up to the light. Again, in the genuine notes, it is as easy to read on the back as on the front, whilst on the forgeries it is next to impossible; and, finally, the paper of the forgeries is soft and yielding.

THE MODERN JESUITS.—The General of the Jesuits at Rome has addressed a long letter to the editor of the Civiltà Cattolica, in consequence of some remarks which have appeared in that journal; explaining what is the real position of the modern Jesuits with respect to all the Governments under which they happen to live. He says:—"Like the Church, the Society of Jesus has neither antipathy nor predilection for the political constitutions of different States. Its members accept with sincerity the form of government under which Providence has placed them, whether it be a power save as a friend encourages them, or one which limits itself to respecting in them the rights which it recognises in other citizens. If the political institutions of the country which they inhabit are defective, they endure these defects; should they be improved, they applaud the ameliorations; should new rights be proclaimed by them for the people, they claim for themselves the benefit of those rights; should the paths of liberty be enlarged they profit by them. Their mission is reconciliation to works of beneficence and zeal. Everywhere they bend to the level of the laws; they respect public powers; they adopt the sentiments of good and loyal citizens. It is thus, because, for a long time, they have felt in their hearts an interest that rises superior to every other—the well-being of man in a better and more desirable life."

CONVERSION OF A JEW TO CATHOLICISM.—On Saturday last a remarkable conversion took place at St. Mary's Oscott, near Birmingham, viz.—the public renunciation of the Jewish religion by Mr. Benjamin Marcus, and his profession of the Roman faith. Mr. Marcus is a native of Russian Poland, author of the new work entitled "Mykur Lyaym," printed at the University Press, Trinity College, Dublin. He is also the author of many other works, and well versed in Hebrew, Chaldee, and Rabbinical erudition. He has, for some years past, been lecturing against Christianity, and in a particular manner against the Protestant version of the Bible. A few days ago he received an introduction to the Rev. J. B. Marra, late under professor of Hebrew at Oxford, and a convert to the Roman Catholic Church, a gentleman intimately acquainted with Jewish modes of thought and reasoning. Discussions took place between these two gentlemen upon the great questions at issue between them, which eventually terminated in the expression, on the part of Mr. Marcus, of a thorough conviction of what he termed the truths of Christianity, and a desire to be admitted into the Romish Church. Before, however, this ceremony took place, Mr. Marcus expressed a desire to state his reasons for his change; and accordingly the household was assembled, young and old, to hear his statement of reasons. The Rev. Mr. Hanage, then performed the ceremony of baptism, after which the convert made a public profession of faith.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD. Nov. 17.

RUMOUR is busy with conjectures as to the successor of Dr. Hampden, in the Regius Professorship of Divinity. Amongst the names mentioned are Dr. Jeune, Master of Pembroke College; Mr. Jacobson, Public Orator and Vice-Principal of Magdalene Hall, a third edition of whose work, the "Patres Apostolici," has just issued from the University Press; and Mr. Stanley, of University College, a son of the Bishop of Oxford. The name of Mr. Garbett, Professor of Poetry, and of Mr. Cureton, of the British Museum, have also been mentioned.

CAMBRIDGE Nov. 17.

The following important notice has just been issued:—

"SIDNEY COLLEGE-LODGE, Nov. 17.—The Vice-Chancellor gives notice that there will be a Congregation on Tuesday next, the 23rd instant, at eleven o'clock, when a Grace will be offered to the Senate for presenting to the House of Commons a petition, of which the following is a draught:—'That your petitioners, in common, as they believe, with the majority of their fellow-subjects, regard with the greatest reverence and affection that part of the Constitution of these realms which assumes all the Members of your hon. House to be Christians, and, as such, to form a fit representative body of a Christian nation. That, in accordance with this principle, every Member of your hon. House is by law required, before he takes his seat, to make profession of his Christian faith. That your petitioners are apprehensive that a measure will be made to effect a change in this part of the Constitution. That your petitioners look with alarm and consternation at the prospect of such a change; and are persuaded that it would be attended with a great shock to the religious feelings of the country, and with serious danger to the national Christian institutions. Your petitioners, therefore, humbly and earnestly pray that no such change may receive the sanction of your hon. House.'"

ELECTION OF LORD RECTOR OF GLASGOW UNIVERSITY.—Lord John Russell has been defeated, after a keen struggle, by Mr. Mure, of Caldwell, M.P. for Renfrewshire. The defeat is the more remarkable, as it has been almost the universal custom to re-elect, for a second year, at least, the Lord Rector of the year immediately preceding. Lord John was elected in 1846, when he was unsuccessfully opposed by Mr. Wordsworth. The votes are polled by nations, and out of the four which compose the University elective body, viz.:—Loudonians, Glottians, Transfurthians, and Rothesians, there were three in favour of Mr. Mure; the respective majorities in all except the first-named, being 11, 11 and 19; and the aggregate of votes:—Mure, 240; Russell, 225. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

The first Session of the New Parliament was opened on Thursday, by Royal Commission.

The House of Lords met at two o'clock, shortly after which hour, the Royal Commissioners, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Lord Chancellor, Earl Spencer, the Marquis of Lansdowne, and Lord Auckland, entered the House and took their seats in front of the Throne.

The Members of the House of Commons having been summoned in the usual manner, the Commission was read.

The Lord Chancellor then desired the Commons to proceed to the Election of their Speaker, and to present him the following day at the bar of their Lordships' House, for the approbation of her Majesty.

The Commons having withdrawn, the Lord Chancellor first, and other Peers in succession, took the oaths, up to the rising of the house.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. THURSDAY.

The doors of the House were opened at one o'clock, but very few members were in attendance before two o'clock. A considerable crowd assembled in Parliament-street and Palace-yard.

Several of the Cabinet Ministers entered the House before two o'clock, at which time the Chief Clerk, Mr. Ley, took his seat at the table. Both sides of the House were now densely crowded with members, and the greatest animation was manifest.

At a quarter-past two o'clock o'clock Sir Augustus Clifford, Usher of the Black Rod, entered the House, and addressing Mr. Ley, said, "I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners to summon the immediate attendance of this hon. House to the House of Lords, for the purpose of hearing the Royal Commission on the opening of Parliament read."

Mr. Ley, followed by the Members present, then proceeded to the House of Lords. On their return

LORD SEYMOUR said he had the honour to propose the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre as Speaker of that House during the ensuing Parliament. He had no doubt the election of that gentleman would be unanimous. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) That right hon. gentleman had discharged his important duties to the entire satisfaction of all parties. (Cheers.) He had maintained the dignity of the chair. (Loud cheers.) It was unnecessary to pay further compliments to their late Speaker, and he, therefore, with great satisfaction, proposed the Right Hon. Charles Shaw Lefevre as Speaker of that House. (Loud and continued cheering from both sides.)

Mr. J. A. SMITH, in a highly complimentary speech on the merits and dignified conduct of Mr. Shaw Lefevre, cordially seconded the motion. He did not think there would be a single vote against the re-election of the right hon. gentleman. (Hear, hear.)

Lord GEORGE BENTINCK said he could not let that opportunity pass without expressing his conviction that Mr. S. Lefevre had performed the duties of the high office of Speaker to the satisfaction of all parties. (Loud cheers.) He could not anticipate any objection to the re-election of the former Speaker (Cheers.)

Sir R. INGLIS also expressed his most cordial approval of the nomination of Mr. Lefevre to the Speaker's chair. The hon. Baronet paid a high eulogium to the services of the right hon. gentleman, and concluded by saying, it would be ungracious of the House not to acknowledge and reward those services. (Cheers.)

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said he felt the greatest pleasure possible at the kind and complimentary manner in which his name had been mentioned as a fit and proper person to fill the chair; and if it was the pleasure of the House to re-elect him, he would discharge the duties faithfully and impartially. (Loud and long-continued cheers.)

The right hon. gentleman was unanimously elected Speaker amidst great cheering from both sides of the House.

Mr. Lefevre was then conducted to the chair by his mover and seconder.

Lord J. RUSSELL complimented the right hon. gentleman on his re-election. The noble Lord then moved that the House do now adjourn. Adjourned at three o'clock until one o'clock tomorrow.

Lord G. Bentinck and Lord J. Russell had a lengthened conversation together during the time the Commission was being read in the House of Lords. Sir R. Inglis and several other members of the House also held short conversations with the Premier.

Most of the Cabinet Ministers were early in their attendance.

LAW INTELLIGENCE.

COURT OF QUEEN'S BENCH.—MONDAY.

(Sittings in Banco.)

LIBEL ON THE BISHOP OF MANCHESTER.—On Tuesday, on the motion of the Attorney-General, an application for a criminal information was granted against a surgeon, residing at Birmingham, named Gutteridge, for having published, respecting the Right Rev. Doctor Lee, the newly-appointed Bishop of Manchester, libellous statements, charging the learned Divine with "lying, drunkenness, and malignity." The libel appeared in the John Bull newspaper.

COURT OF COMMON PLEAS.—MONDAY.

(Sittings in Banco.)

REGISTRATION APPEALS.—IMPORTANT DECISION.—TOMS v. LUCKETT, AND DOWDING v. LUCKETT.—These were both appeals from the decision of the Revising Barrister for the City of London. The points involved were nearly the same. In the first, Moses Toms, the appellant, occupied apartments in a house, the shop and parlours of which were occupied by the landlord. The landlord did not reside on the premises, and both the appellant and the landlord had a key of the outer door. In the second case, appellant occupied a counting-house, at No 11, Mark-lane, where the landlord of his premises and five other persons had counting-houses also. A clerk of the landlord resided on the premises for the purpose of protecting them, and for the accommodation of those who occupied the counting-houses. The clerk alone had a key of the outer gate. In the first, the Revising Barrister had admitted the objection taken against the claimant's right of vote on the ground that he had not the exclusive control of the outer door of the premises. The Court were of opinion that such objection was not well founded, and that the absence of an exclusive control was not essential to entitle the claimant to vote. Decision of the Barrister reversed. In the second case, where the question turned on the question of occupancy, the Court observed that a counting-house occupied by the appellant was a qualification which came within the express words of the Reform Act, and the case resembled that of chambers in the Albany, or shops in the Burlington Arcade, where there was a gate or other common entrance at the end. The decision of the Revising Barrister must, therefore, be reversed. Rule accordingly.

POLICE.

MANSION HOUSE.

SANATORY STATE OF THE CITY.—The Lord Mayor received from Mr. Hodgson, the Superintendent of the City police, a letter, written by Assistant-Inspector Scott, and transmitted by the Lord Mayor to the Sanatory Commissioners. It is dated Moor-lane Station, November 8, and deserves attention at the present moment. The Inspector states that in consequence of illness and death in the neighbourhood of Aldersgate, Bridgewater-square, &c., supposed to be caused from exhalations from a burial-ground situated in Golden-lane, belonging to a man named Bamford, who has it on lease, he sent a constable to the burial-ground, on the preceding Sunday, when he saw eleven graves open, about twenty-eight feet deep, one of which contained nine coffins on each other, the graves being merely covered over with planks until they are quite full to within a yard of the surface, when the ground is covered in. They are frequently left thus for a week or ten days, the atmosphere is, therefore, seldom free from the effluvium of decomposed matter. On his rounds at night the Inspector has noticed a noxious smell arising from the rear of the graveyard in Sun-court, which was almost suffocating. He reports a large amount of sickness in the neighbourhood, and numerous deaths, and mentions persons in lucrative business in the vicinity who have abandoned it rather than continue to reside in a locality infected with so fatal a malaria; and having annexed a list of the dying and the dead—victims within the last few weeks—of the febrile diseases which are generated in the densely-peopled courts and alleys of this quarter by the foul exhalations from the graveyard, the Inspector concludes with the following postscript:—"P.S. I have endeavoured to gather the above particulars as quietly as possible, and have no doubt that much more important information would be obtained if a public inquiry were made, and that it would be found that this report very much underrates the magnitude of the evil." [We trust the Inspector's suggestion of "public inquiry" may not be neglected by the Commissioners.—ED. I.L.N.]

MARYLEBONE.

On Wednesday, Anne Simons, Mr. Hickmon, a merchant, and Ben Simons, the father of the first-named prisoner, were brought up for final examination before Mr. Hammerton, on the recent charge of extensive robbery at Messrs. Marshall and Stinton's, silkmercers, &c., Vere-street, Oxford-street. All the requisite evidence having been completed, the accused parties were committed for trial at the Central Criminal Court. Mr. Hickman is under bail, himself in £500, and two sureties of £250 each, to be forthcoming at the sessions.

FATAL ACCIDENTION IN THE STREET.—A person named J. Bent, residing at 21, May's-buildings, St. Martin's-lane, who, some weeks ago, left a machinist's copy after him in a Blackwall omnibus, and subsequently requested the conductor to take care of it for him, went, on Tuesday last, to the omnibus at Charing-cross, and, having charged the conductor (Henry Wilkinson) with unlawfully detaining his property, gave him into the custody of constable 72 F. Wilkinson was so affected by the accusation, that, although a moment previously in apparent good health, he fell down insensible, as if in a fit, the blood rushing from his mouth and nose, and expired without a moan. The corpse was instantly taken to Charing-cross Hospital, when Drs. Golding, Chowne, and Sheame were in immediate attendance, and the most active efforts made to restore animation, but without effect—the vital spark had fled. An inquest was held on Thursday, when it appeared from an examination of the body which had been made at the Hospital that the death arose from aneurism of the aorta. The jury returned a verdict, "That the deceased died from a rupture of an aneurism of the aorta, accelerated by excitement; and the Jury are also unanimously of opinion that the charge against the deceased was groundless."

TYPHOON IN THE CHINA SEAS.

(Extract from a Letter to a Correspondent.)

"H.M.S. Vernon, Hong-Kong, July 22nd, 1847.

"We were delayed a few hours on our way to this place, strange as the notion may seem to you, in order to allow a Typhon to pass. It appears, from the investigations of Colonel Reid and some other patient and diligent observers of atmospherical phenomena, that a 'Horn-book of Storms,' for the Indian and China Seas, has been published, whereby it is clearly shown, and especially to nautical men, that, among the many things unseen by which we are surrounded, high-winds are subjected to fixed laws affecting their motions and duration, and directed in their courses by the same unerring hand which regulates in wisdomthe more visible things of creation!

"On the 19th inst., at about midnight, a swell of unusual height met the ship while running in her proper course, N.N.E.; and, we likewise observed a heavy bank of clouds lining the eastern horizon, whence, also, the swell proceeded.

"At eight A.M. of the 20th, the swell had greatly increased, the before-mentioned heavy banks of clouds had closed around us, the wind being unsteady in force, as well as in direction, and the barometer oscillating. With these and other indications in the heavens, well known to the practised eye as the precursors of an approaching tempest, we cautiously opened the mysterious 'Horn-book of Storms,' to learn from its pages the means by which, if haply, we might avoid the impending danger.

"At eleven A.M., the squalls were violent, and the rain descended in torrents. We, therefore, close-reefed topsails and altered course, following the directions of the 'Book of Storms.' Behold the diagram —

"Explanation—The large arrow passing through the centres of the circles indicates the track of the Typhon, N. W., which proceeds on, it is calculated, in the same direction, at the rate of from ten to fifteen miles an hour. The extent of the curves, from side to side, varies, according to the same authority, from 100 to 200 miles.

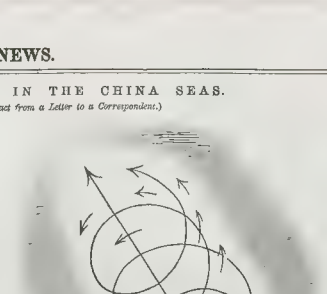
"Of course, the atmosphere, to the extent of many miles beyond the outer edges of the circles or curves, is violently agitated. This we perceived by the dense mass of clouds formed to the westward of the Typhoon, and, consequently, upon our eastern horizon, when at Number 1. The sea, likewise, raised and put in powerful commotion, was thrown off in irregular lines towards us. If we had now stood on in the same course (N.N.E.), it is evident that we should have gone headlong into the centre of the Typhoon i.e., when we were at Number 2, which was our position at eleven A.M. of the 20th. When, therefore, we referred to the 'Book of Storms,' we ascertained by one of the tables that, as our wind was now N.W., the centre of the Typhoon must bear N.E. of us. Accordingly, we altered course.

"The Book goes on to direct that we notice which way the wind changes; and as, in our case, it gradually passed round to the westward, it showed that, when arrived at Number 3, the body of the Typhoon was to the north of us. It was during this changing of the wind from Number 2 to Number 3, that the oldest seaman on board felt that we were within the direct influence of the tempest, such being the motion of the ship.

"Having thus run under the stern of the Typhoon (if I may use the expression), we stood on till the wind became S.W., at which time the hurricane bore N.W. of us, and we knew that we had passed to the eastward of it, we being then, at six, P.M., at Number 4. Orders were, therefore, given to resume our proper course, which was done accordingly. Thus, within the last twenty-four hours, we escaped from a most unpleasant companion, which, had we adhered to old prejudices, would have borne us on with reckless impetuosity to the N.W., and might have engulfed us, in its mad career, in a watery grave!

"Had this beautiful theory been generally believed, many a life would have been saved; for it seems to be proved by its authors, R. T. Piddington and Col. Reid, that 'the four East India ships which foundered in the "Culloden storm," were, when last seen, scudding in the most dangerous quadrant of the storm.' The authors, in their concluding remarks, make an eloquent and touching appeal to Englishmen, asserting that they profess 'to teach the plainest of our shipmasters' how to gauge his barque in comparative safety, and to use the scourge of the tempest as a beneficent power and friendly aid.

"The 'Horn-book of Storms' is distributed gratuitously, on application to the 'Sub-Secretary of the Asiatic Society of Bengal.' It is sold in London by W. H. Allen, of Leadenhall-street. Pray recommend the work far and wide, for it is calculated to confer the greatest benefit on captains of vessels coming out here, who will read it with a candid mind, and a wish to believe in the doctrine it sets forth.



The Arrows denote the directions of the Wind in our progress.

"I will end my remarks by observing, that on the day above-named a Typhoon passed over this island, and that an Indiaman, then about 160 miles to the east ward of us, was dismasted. So that the most inveterate sceptics on board the Vernon—and they were not a few—having thus had conviction forced upon their minds, are now the loudest applauders of the 'Theory of Storms.'"

(The "Circular Theory of Storms" is strongly recommended to the notice of sailors; and they will find much assistance, also, from daily observations of the barometer, and of the dry and wet bulb thermometer. We will take this opportunity of recommending meteorologists more fully to investigate the subject of the theory of storms. The writer of this has been in a locality where the air has been in a calm state, whilst at the same time (as he has learned from letters addressed to him), a gale of wind has been blowing around him, the direction of the wind being, in some places, due E., in others due W., and blowing from different points at other places at the same time. J. G.)

LONDON AND YORK RAILWAY.—Great activity prevails in the neighbourhood of Spalding, owing to the number of hands employed on the London and York Railway. Timber of all dimensions continues to float almost daily down the river; upwards of 30,000 diagonal sleepers, eight inches each way, are already stacked up between Spalding and Peterborough, and several engines are daily at work in driving piles for the erection of bridges on the line near the town.

GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY.—Owing to the general suspension of new works throughout the Great Western system, between 300 and 400 mechanics have been discharged from the company's locomotive works at Swindon. The 800 or 900 remaining hands at work have volunteered a reduction (3s. per cent upon their wages, towards the support of those out of work; Mr. Brunel, the engineer, subscribing £100, and Mr. Gooch, the locomotive superintendent, £50.

FIRST-CLASS PASSENGERS. In going to Bristol, the third-class passenger is more than seven hours on the road, while the second-class only four, having three hours more time for his business; and in going to Exeter the third-class passenger is more than eleven hours and a half on the road, while the second-class traveller performs his journey in seven thus nearly five hours.

MENDELSSOHN'S FUNERAL.

IN THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of Saturday last, we gave a brief memoir of Mendelssohn, and our Artist and Engraver supplied a Portrait of the celebrated Composer. Our Musical Reporter has since forwarded from Paris the following details as to the honours paid to his memory in Leipsig and Berlin, on the occasion of the removal of Mendelssohn's remains and interment at Berlin, with some additional particulars of his career —

"On the 5th instant, the body was removed to the Church of the University, headed by a military band, playing Beethoven's Dead March. The cortège was composed of the concert orchestra of the Gervandhaus, the pupils of the Academy of Music, founded by the deceased; the coffin, with the pall supported by Moscheles, David, Hauptmann, and Gade, Professors of the Conservatory; the brother of Mendelssohn, as chief mourner; and the Philharmonic Societies, besides artists from Dresden, &c. The Pastor Bourwig pronounced the funeral oration. During the service, an organ prelude and a Chorale from "Paul," by Mendelssohn; a Chorale from Bach's "Passione," &c., were executed by a band led by David, and conducted by Gade.

"The portrait of Mendelssohn was taken, as he was, in the Coffin, which was open during the service by Bendemann, Hubert, and Richard, of the Academy of Fine Arts, at Dresden. A laurel crown was placed on the head of the deceased. At ten, in the evening, the coffin was closed, and was borne by the pupils of the Conservatory to the terminus of the railroad for Berlin. More than 2000 persons bearing torches accompanied the procession during its mournful progress through the streets of Leipsig, which were crowded in every part. On the way to Berlin, the train stopped at every station by the population of Goethen, Dessau, &c.; funeral chorales being sung as it passed. The venerable Schneider, the composer of the oratorio of "The Last Judgment," conducted a funeral chant at Dessau. At eight, A.M., on the 7th, the funeral train reached Berlin. The bier was decorated with large branches of oak and a laurel crown, and was then placed in a magnificent funeral car, drawn by six horses. It was covered to the Cemetery of the Holy Trinity, followed by the crowd, with uncovered heads; the military bands playing Beethoven's "Dead March."

"Two pastors and several friends of the deceased delivered orations over the grave, and a chorus of 600 young persons sung the hymn, by Graeber, accompanied by wind instruments, 'Christ and the Resurrection.' It is impossible to describe the agitation of the assemblage as the men threw earth on the coffin, and the women and children threw flowers into the grave. Mendelssohn now sleeps with his lamented sister, whose death exercised such a potent influence on his mind. The King of Prussia sent a letter to Mendelssohn, expressing his gratification at hearing his oratorio of 'Elijah.' Alas! this letter reached Leipsig the day after Mendelssohn's death.

"Such are the details given in the Berlin State Gazette and in private letters of the honours paid in Germany to this great Composer. It was at Paris, on my way to Leipsig and Berlin, to visit Mendelssohn, that I heard of his decease. Whether his abilities as a musician or his merits as a man be considered, he was equally great. As a composer, he was remarkable for his originality, fancy, imagination, feeling, and poetry. The test of his principal works will establish the justice of these judgments. In sacred productions he has left 'Paul' and 'Elijah,' and the Cantata of the 'Hymn of Praise,' besides innumerable hymns, psalms, anthems, chorales, preludes, and fugues for the organ. He edited, for the Handel Society of London, 'Israel in Egypt.' He also edited Bach's Chorales. 'Paul' was produced at the Dusseldorf Festival, on the 22d of May, 1836, and at the Liverpool Musical Festival, in the autumn of the same year. It was this oratorio which first made known Mendelssohn's genius to the English public. 'Elijah' was first performed at the Birmingham Festival in August 1846; but, great as was its success, the composer was not satisfied, and in April of this year, it was produced with considerable alterations at Exeter Hall. Four times was it given, conducted by the composer, to immense audiences. It was next executed at Birmingham—and in September last at the Gloucester Musical Festival. Last month it was done at Berlin, and if Mendelssohn had lived, he would have directed the performance next month at Vienna.

"Mendelssohn wrote but one opera for the stage, 'Die Hochzeit von Camacho,' (Wedding of Camacho), produced in 1827, at Berlin, when he was only 18 years of age. He withdrew this work, and nothing is left of it but the overture. Mendelssohn was cautious to a degree, and required an unexampled quantity of study to satisfy his exigencies. Hundreds were sent to him and declined; amongst others, Scribe's version of Shakspeare's 'Tempest.' Notwithstanding the announcement of this opera, it is certain that Mendelssohn never composed a note nor promised to write it. He accepted lately a poem called 'Lorely,' and whilst he was at Interlachen, in Switzerland, during this summer, he composed the first act of it. It was to have been produced in Berlin, and this is all that remains in the way of operatic writing from the inspiration of Mendelssohn. And yet it is palpable, from Mendelssohn's dramatic works, such as the music to Part "Oedipus Colonus" to the "Antigone" of Sophocles; to the "Athalie" of Racine; to the "Midsummer Night's Dream" of Shakespeare; to the First "Walpergi's Night" of Goethe; and from the exquisite melodies in the six books of "Lieder ohne worte" (songs without words), that the genius of Mendelssohn would have been as supreme for the stage as it had proved transcendant for the cathedral and church, and for the closet and concert-room.

"As an instrumental writer, Mendelssohn leaves rich legacies. We have three symphonies, No. 1, in C minor; No. 2, in A major; and No. 3, in A minor; the second is unpublished, and is in the Philharmonic library. There are two pianoforte concertos, No. 1, in G minor; No. 2, in D minor, with one single violin concerto. His overtures were the "Meerstille," the "Isles of Fingal," "La Belle Melusine," "Ruy Blas," and a characteristic overture in C for two performers. He has written an etiotto for two violins, two second violins, two altos, and two violoncellos, quintuors, quintuors, trios, sonatas, caprices, studies, fantasias, rondos, fast songs or gleos, &c., too numerous to enumerate here.

"The gigantic grasp of intellect exhibited in Mendelssohn's varied compositions will find its match in the same rate with Handel, Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven. At eight years of age he was a musician—at sixteen he was already a great composer; but, we have yet to consider him in another capacity—as an executant. As a pianist, for the rapidity of his execution, and right reading, he has never been excelled—scarcely approached. His memory was prodigious: it had a strength and readiness scarcely credible. He knew every master and every work: he would play anything that was asked for, instantly, and without a fault. Mendelssohn's organ playing was as perfect as his pianoforte execution, and this is the more surprising as such opposite qualifications are required. He was the only organist who ever really conquered the Birmingham monster instrument. To listen to Mendelssohn in Bach's fugues, was, indeed, a rare treat. His touch was as delicate as it was firm—no intricacies appalled him. Yet, had Mendelssohn another exquisite gift—this was his improvisation. His extempore playing seemed as if the ideas arose from profound meditation. The fire, energy, and enthusiasm with which he expanded his theme was miraculous: his invention was never at fault; and, as he combined his subjects at the close, it was like the rushing of a mighty torrent.

"Mendelssohn was a most accomplished scholar. Besides being an excellent classic, he spoke and wrote French, English, Italian, and German, with equal facility. He was also an admirable artist and a delightful poet. He was a firm friend, and in every relation of social life, kind, amiable, and generous. He has left a widow and six children to mourn his premature loss. He loved England and her institutions—his most revered last after his family were in this country. It is, indeed, a sad bereavement—deplorable and disastrous for the sake of Art. He was the musical master-mind of his age, and his private worth was so great, that there is no room for consolation for those who knew him. He has died in the prime of life and in the zenith of his fame—the musical world has lost its brightest ornament."

By aid of a Correspondent, we are enabled to present our readers with a Sketch of the funeral procession of the lamented poet-musician, as it passed from the house of Mendelssohn, in the Konig Strasse, to St. Paul's or the University Church, by way of the Promenade and Peter Strasse, at Leipsig.

The coffin was conveyed on a car, elaborately decorated, the lower part was draped with white linen; and the pall covering the coffin was trimmed with silver fringe, beading, and silver stars; the centre was richly embroidered in silver with branches, above which were wreaths of leaves and flowers fastened to the pall with white satin ribbon; whilst it was surmounted with palm branches and a leafy crown. The car was drawn by four horses, nearly covered with black cloth, and led by attendants in cloaks, hat-bands, and streamers to their cravats. Beside the car, walked attendants bearing olive-branches. Before and following the corpse was a long line of friends of the deceased, four abreast, then followed three clergymen, bareheaded, in black gowns and large projecting frills; next, two bands of music; chief mourners; pupils of the Conservatorium, &c.; and a young man bearing a silver wreath.

FUNERAL OF MENDELSSOHN, AT LEIPZIG.

FUNERAL OF THE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.

EARLY last week, it was intimated that the remains of this distinguished Prelate would be removed from the palace at Bishopthorpe to Stanton Harcourt, in Oxfordshire, for interment.

Immediately a meeting of the Council of the city of York was held, at which a resolution was passed, requesting the Lord Mayor to summon the Corporation, and to invite the attendance of the citizens, for the purpose of testifying their deep respect and veneration for the memory of his Grace the Lord Archbishop of the province, by joining the funeral procession from Bishopthorpe. The Council likewise agreed to an address to the family of the Archbishop, testifying sympathy for the bereavement which they have experienced by his Grace's death. At the request of the Archdeacon of York, the clergy also attended in great numbers, to avail themselves of the last opportunity of testifying their esteem for their late diocesan.

Friday last was the day appointed for the removal of the corpse, which was, accordingly, placed in the hearse, at a quarter past twelve o'clock.

The outer coffin was covered with silk velvet ornamented with gilt lace; and on the lid was a massive silver plate, bearing the following inscription:—

"EDWARD HARCOURT, ARCHBISHOP OF YORK,
Born Oct. 10, A.D. 1757.
Died Nov. 5, A.D. 1847, in the 40th year of his Primacy."

The procession then left Bishopthorpe in the following order:—

Two Pages with wands.
Plumes.
Mutes.
The Undertaker (Mr. Beal).

THE HEARSE,
Drawn by six horses.
Three Mourning Coaches, each drawn by four horses.
His Grace's Private Carriage.
The Carriage of the Bishop of Ripon.
The Carriage of Lord Wenlock.
The Carriage of the Lord Mayor.
Five other private carriages.

In the mourning coaches were the Rev. Leveson V. Harcourt, Captain F. Vernon Harcourt, Captain O. V. Harcourt, the Rev. Charles Vernon Harcourt, Egerton V. Harcourt, Esq., Granville H. Vernon, Esq., the Rev. E. H. Vernon, Sir J. V. B. Johnston, Bart., Lieut.-Colonel Malcolm, the Rev. W. Gooch, the Rev. F. B. Boothby, &c.

Joseph Buckle, Esq., Deputy Registrar of the diocese, W. Gray, Esq., solicitor to the late Archbishop; Dr. Simpson and Richard Hey, Esq., his medical attendants, were also present.

On reaching Clementhorpe, the funeral procession was met by the clergy, who had assembled in the Bishopgate-street school-room, and comprised the Archdeacons of the diocese, the members of the Chapter, and the parochial clergy. The reverend gentlemen were in their robes, and wore black silk scarves and gloves. There were upwards of 100 present.

When the procession arrived at Micklegate Bar, it was joined by the Lord Mayor, with his chaplain, (the Rev. Canon Sutton,) the High Sheriff of the city, the Aldermen, Councillors, and a very numerous body of influential citizens, to the number of upwards of 200.

Our Artist has sketched the procession, immediately after its entry in York by Micklegate Bar. The Hearse, it will be seen, was of Gothic design—in appropriately solemn taste.

The day was exceedingly wet; nevertheless, many thousands were assembled in the streets, as the procession passed on, to pay their last tribute of respect to departed excellence, and a great number of shops in the city were closed at noon.

The streets were lined by the troops of the 6th Dragoon Guards from Micklegate Bar to the railway station, where the procession arrived at a quarter to two o'clock. Here the Corporation, Clergy, &c., formed into line along the platform, whilst the mourning coaches being drawn up, the mourners alighted, and were conducted to the carriages attached to the special train.

The hearse was then placed on a carriage truck, and punctually to the time appointed—viz., two o'clock—the train left the the station, the vast assembly standing uncovered.

The procession then re-formed, and proceeded to the Cathedral, where divine service was performed at half-past two, and Handel's celebrated funeral anthem, "When the ear heard him," was performed.

From twelve to two o'clock the great bell at the Cathedral, and the bells of the various parish churches, were tolled. Minute-guns were also fired from the vessels on the river. The shops and other places of business in Coney-street, Spurrier-gate, Stonegate, and other principal streets were entirely closed; the windows in many private houses were also closed, in respect to the late diocesan.

On Friday night the body was conveyed to Aylesbury.

The interment took place on Saturday morning, when the corpse was removed to Stanton Harcourt, near Oxford, where the remains of many of the Harcourt family repose in a large vault, beneath that portion of the church called the Harcourt Aisle.

On the procession reaching the village of Stanton Harcourt, the Rev. W. Walsh met the corpse at the churchyard-gate, the tenantry of the late Archbishop ranging themselves on each side, until the mourners had passed into the church. The service was read in a most impressive manner by the clergyman. The body was deposited in the family vault, where no less than eleven of his Lordship's ancestors repose. In the same vault were deposited, after the funeral, the remains of the late Archbishop's lady and his eldest daughter, which had been disinterred and brought, agreeably to his Lordship's desire, the former from York and the latter from London.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE ARCHBISHOP OF YORK.—THE PROCESSION FROM BISHOPTHORPE ENTERING YORK.

FUNCHAL, MADEIRA.—(FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.)

ARRIVAL OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN DOWAGER AT MADEIRA.

We are happy to record the safe arrival at Funchal, of her Majesty Queen Adelaide, with her relatives, their Serene Highnesses the Duchess Ida, Prince Edward, and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar; all in excellent health.

The Howe, 120, Captain Sir James Stirling, arrived off Madeira, on Monday, the 1st instant, after a pleasant voyage of seven days from Lisbon. Her Majesty seemed highly gratified with the sea voyage, and passed several hours daily on deck with the Duchess Ida, and the several members of her suite.

The Morning Post Correspondent gives the following interesting account of the landing:—

"At two, P.M., on Monday, the Queen Dowager, the Duchess Ida of Saxe Weimar, accompanied by Prince Edward, Colonel Cornwall, and the other members of the Royal suite, left the Howe, and attended by Captain Sir James Stirling, came ashore. Salutes were fired from the citadel and fort, and from a Portuguese brig lying off the island. At least, 4000 persons had congregated on the beach to welcome the presence of her Majesty, and the day was considered a perfect holiday.

"On landing, the pathway was strewed with flowers and myrtle branches, the populace evincing their gratification at the visit of the illustrious Queen by the most respectful bearing. As her Majesty passed, the most respectful salutations were given to the party, who returned the acknowledgments in a gracious manner."

After visiting the mansion selected for the Royal suite (the Governor's residence), about half a mile from the place where her Majesty and party landed, the Queen returned to the Howe, to dine and sleep on board.

"Next day, directly after luncheon, the Queen Dowager, with the Duchess Ida of Saxe Weimar, Prince Edward and the Princesses of Saxe Weimar, Colonel and Mrs. Cornwall; Hon. Miss Seymour, Maid of Honour; the Rev. Mr. Hudson, and the personages attached to the Royal household, were conducted on shore by Captain Sir James Stirling. Her Majesty then thanked the gallant Captain for the attention he had displayed, and Sir James was also charged to convey her Majesty's gracious pleasure to the officers and seamen under his command.

"The Dowager Queen then entered a sedan in waiting, and was borne to her residence, the Duchess Ida and the ladies in the Royal retinue being accommodated with palanquins.

"Throughout the forenoon, the baggage was removed from the Howe, and taken to the Governor's residence, with the domestics in the Royal Household.

"The Howe sailed the same evening; the packet having left in the day for England, with letters to Queen Victoria and members of the Royal Family, apprising them of the Dowager Queen's safe arrival. The weather was remarkably fine, and excessively hot.

"His Serene Highness the Duke Bernard of Saxe Weimar and Prince Gustavus were expected to arrive at Funchal, from Germany, about the middle of the month."

We have annexed a picturesque Engraving of the Roadstead of Funchal, the only town of the island: it lies on the southern coast, and is backed by basalt rocks, which rise with a steep ascent towards the interior. The roadstead has a rocky and uneven anchorage, in which vessels are exposed to great danger from November to February, when gales from the south-east and south-west prevail. Yet the place is much visited by ships for refreshment, and from it all the produce of the island is exported. The town consists of a pretty wide street along the sea-shore; and, numerous small lanes extend up the slope of the hill. The place is defended by four forts, and has eight churches, and several convents. Our view is from a Sketch, by a Correspondent. We append, also, a view of the Governor's House, wherein the Queen Dowager and suite will be located during their sojourn in the Island.

THE GOVERNOR'S HOUSE, MADEIRA, THE RESIDENCE OF QUEEN ADELAIDE.

CABINET COUNCIL.—A Cabinet Council was held at the Foreign Office on Tuesday. Previous to the Council several of the Ministers had interviews with Lord John Russell, at his Lordship's official residence in Downing-street.

A DEPUTATION of West India merchants, consisting of Messrs. Shand and Sandbatch, from Liverpool; Messrs. Bromley, Kelling, and Campbell, from Glasgow; Mr. A. MacGregor, from London; Sir J. Kingston James, Bart., and Mr. Wilson, from Dublin; Mr. Miles, M.P., and Mr. Claxton, from Bristol; Mr. Patterson, from Leith; and Messrs. Speirs and Darling, from Trinidad, had an interview with Lord John Russell and the Chancellor of the Exchequer on Saturday, at the official residence of the noble Lord in Downing-street.

PENSION TO THE WIDOW OF THE LATE JAMES MARSH.—The Board of Ordnance has, after repeated applications, awarded a pension of £20 per annum to the widow of the late James Marsh, whose test for the detection of minute quantities of arsenic, and other discoveries in chemistry, has given his name an European reputation.

STATUE TO NELSON.—A subscription has been set on foot for the purpose of defraying the cost of a colossal marble statue of Nelson, to be erected in the city of Norwich. A statuette has been modeled by Mr. Milnes, sculptor, from which the colossal statue is to be executed; and the skill with which that gentleman has embodied the design gives good reason to expect from the same hand a beautiful work of art worthy of England's first naval hero. The statue of his Grace the Duke of Wellington, for the new barracks at the Tower of London, is now being modeled by Mr. Milnes.

THE EARL AND THE FARMER.—A farmer called on Earl Fitzwilliam and complained that, in his hunting excursions with his hounds, he had trodden down a field of wheat so as to do it damage. The Earl told him that if he would procure an estimate of the loss he would pay it. The man informed him that he had done so already, and it was believed the damage would be £50. The Earl paid it. But, as spring came on, the wheat, which had been trodden down, grew up, and became the best in the field. The farmer honestly returned the fifty pounds. "Ah," said the Earl, "this is what I like. This is as it ought to be between man and man." After making some inquiries about his family, the Earl went into another room, and returning, gave the man a check for one hundred pounds, saying, "Take care of this, and when your eldest son is of age present it to him, and tell him the occasion that produced it."

SHAKESPEARE'S HOUSE.—The performances to lessen the balance for which the London and Stratford-on-Avon Committees rendered themselves liable on purchasing Shakespere's House, will take place at Covent Garden on the 7th of December. The Committees have circulated a programme of the performances, leaving the actors' names to be filled up by those who intend taking part in the various scenes, which are as follow: 1. The Episode of the Clowns and their Play: "A Midsummer Night's Dream." 2. The Death of Henry IV: Second Part of King Henry IV." 3. The Story of Prospero: "Tempest." 4. Falstaff's Recruits before Justice Shallow: Second Part of "King Henry IV." 5. The Balcony Scene: "Romeo and Juliet." 6. The Statue Scene: "A Winter's Tale." 7. Katherine and Petruchio: The acting piece entire, as taken from "The Taming of the Shrew." The performances will be under the patronage of her Majesty.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.

NEW SERIES.—No. I.

We this week commence a new series of Parliamentary Portraits. The last election introduced more changes into the Legislature than any previous one, with the exception of the first appeal to the hustings under the Reform Bill. The current of public opinion, in the present instance, has run against party men, even though they were distinguished by their services and abilities, and the most distinguishing feature of the present Parliament is, the great increase in the number of members connected with the railway interest. In addition to the many in the old Parliament who were connected with these undertakings, twenty-one new members have now been returned, who are all Directors or Chairmen of Companies. The Engineers, too, have received a due acknowledgment of their talent and influence, by the return, from among that most able class of practical, scientific men, of Mr. Stephenson and Mr. Cubitt. The Contractors are not omitted; they have sent a representative in the person of Mr. Peto. The new Parliament is completely identified in composition with the "spirit of the age;" and it is among the "new men," who represent this practical, enterprising spirit, that we shall principally select the portraits of our new series. We commence with

MR. GEORGE CARR GLYN, M.P.

Mr. Glyn is the fourth son of the late Sir Richard Carr Glyn, Bart., and Alderman, who had served the office of Lord Mayor of London. His mother was the daughter of J. Plumptre, Esq., of Fredville, Kent formerly Member for Nottingham; he is in the 60th year of his age He married in 1823, Mary Anne, daughter of the late Pascoe Grenfell Esq., M.P., of Taplow House, Bucks.

Mr. Glyn is the chairman of the London and North Western Railway Company, of which he was one of the earliest Directors. He is the head of one of the most powerful associations in the world, for the company is stated to possess a capital of more than twenty millions sterling, and a line of four hundred miles in length. Mr. Glyn was appointed a director of the London and Birmingham Company on the 21st of October, 1830. He is named a Director in the Act of Incorporation, bearing date the 6th of May, 1833; and on the retirement of

MR. GEORGE CARR GLYN, M.P. FOR KENDAL.

Mr. Isaac Solly, he was unanimously elected Chairman of the London and Birmingham Railway Company, on the 11th of April, 1837. On the amalgamation, in 1846, of the London and Birmingham and Grand Junction Companies, under the title of the London and North Western Railway Company, Mr. Glyn was, with equal unanimity, chosen Chairman of the united Board. He is also a Director of the Chester and Holyhead Railway, of the St. Katherine's Dock Company, and of the Globe Insurance Company, a Trustee of the City Club, and a Commissioner of Lieutenancy for the City of London.

In addition to the onerous duties of these posts, Mr. Glyn is one of the heads of the extensive Banking establishment of Glyn, Halifax, and Co., Lombard-street. As a banker he has the reputation of being one of the most liberal in London, in his mode of conducting business. He is of very active and energetic habits, and from his position will rank in the House next to Mr Hudson, as Mr. C. Russell, the Chairman of the Great Western Company, is no longer a member. Mr. Glyn was returned at the last election for the borough of Kendal, and takes his seat in Parliament for the first time. In politics he is the advocate of Liberal opinions and Free-Trade. He will oppose any endowment of the Catholic Clergy.

LEGAL APPOINTMENTS.—E. F. Maitland, Esq., Advocate, has been appointed Advocate Depute, in room of Archibald Davidson, Esq., now Sheriff of Kincardineshire; and under the new service of Heirs' Act, which came into operation on the 15th inst., Patrick Shaw, Esq., Advocate, has been appointed Sheriff of Chancery.

ORIGIN OF THE STOCK EXCHANGE.—"Yesterday," says an old newspaper, dated July 15, 1773, "the brokers and others at New Jonathan's came to a resolution that, instead of its being called 'New Jonathan's,' it should be called 'The Stock Exchange,' which is to be wrote over the door. The brokers then collected sixpence each, and christened the house with punch."

REFORMATION OF JUVENILE OFFENDERS.—One of the two anniversary meetings of the Philanthropic Society was held on Sunday last, at the institution, St. George's-fields, when an able sermon was preached before the treasurer, Mr. Gladstone, the Right Hon. Sir George Grey, the Right Hon. W. E. Gladstone, Sir H. Vyvyan, the Earl of Denbigh, &c., and other friends of the Society, by the Rev. William Harrison, M.A., lately preacher to the Magdalen Hospital, and incumbent of St. Michael's, Pimlico. The sermon was followed by the unusually large collection of £168. Upwards of ninety of the lads who have left the Society during the last three years attended on the occasion, and were regaled with a substantial dinner. The boys were addressed by the treasurer, Mr. Gladstone, Sir G. Grey, the Rev. Dr. Rice, Rev. Mr. Harrison, &c. There are now 114 boys in the Society's school.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1847.

THE City of London, which, last Session, got itself exempted from the operation of the Health of Towns Bill, is now compelled to purchase any future exemption by independent action. To stand still, a mere obstruction in the way of improvement, is, as we lately took occasion to remark, impossible. It is well that this much is beginning to be perceived eastward of Temple-bar—that barrier where so much legislation has been obliged to stop short.

The first Session of a new Parliament has just opened; on the eve of its sitting, the Corporation of the City has given notice of its intention to apply for two Acts, very comprehensive in their objects and powers. Of these measures, a brief outline, as far as their purposes can be extracted from the legal jargon in which they are described, will not be uninteresting. The penitent who has so long and so grievously neglected his duty, is beginning to set his house in order, and everybody is interested in knowing how it will be done.

The first Act is one "to provide for the sanatory improvement of the City of London and the Liberties thereof, and for the better sewering, lighting, and paving the same." For this purpose, it is necessary to enlarge the powers of four other Acts, each of which was an alteration and amendment of its predecessor—a proof in itself of how the wants of Society have grown, and, at long intervals, compelled the most sluggish bodies to act. The intended Act is to give the Commissioners power to construct drains from private houses and properties into the large public sewers, wholly or partially at the expense of the owners of such houses; they are to have power of cleansing and emptying drains and cesspools of a more summary description than they have hitherto possessed; owners are to be compelled to provide cisterns, and a full supply of water, for the use of inmates and occupiers (here the spirit of improvement will come into collision with the water monopolies); a regulating power over the erection of hoards and scaffoldings is given; and some control over that "unflagging industry" that too often blockades our streets to lay down pipes and mains.

These are minor matters compared to what follows: the Commissioners are to have, or, at least, to ask for, the power of appointing "Officers of Health and Inspectors of Nuisances," with all the authority necessary for a proper exercise of their functions, which we hope will be suppressive to the point of efficiency, short of which it is too much the habit of the Legislature to stop. The next series of powers sought is open to more objection, as intimating a desire to tolerate and continue existing evils rather than to abolish them. For instance, slaughter-houses and knackers' yards are to be "registered, licensed, and regulated;" abolition is the word for these sources of disease, and dens of cruelty; and, on this point, the public must, to use an Americanism, "go the whole ticket." The same remark applies to the intended mode of dealing with the terrible abuse of burial in cities and in towns under this new Bill. Interments in "burial-grounds and vaults" are to be "regulated" only: this will not do: the evil is too frightful to be palliated by "regulations:" it must be made to cease: the Metropolis of England cannot be left the only city of Europe that receives into its own bosom the mortality of two millions, and crushes and packs the decay and corruption of a nation into holes and corners surrounded by life, which, breathing animal poison, ceases to be healthy life. In this conflict with disease, there are some things to which we can show no quarter, with which there can be no compromise.

On these two things, we repeat—the slaughter-houses within the City, and burials we may literally say in the streets—the public must imperatively insist on total abolition—all vested interests, private convenience, and assertions of "it can't be done," to the contrary notwithstanding. While we write, a letter appears in a leading journal, describing the slaughter-houses in Whitechapel, and proving the existence of a state of things in this wealthy metropolis that would disgrace a Hottentot kraal. We will quote a few passages, reminding the reader this is only a sketch of these places in one part of London:—

The butchers' shops are chiefly open houses, projecting from their dwellings into the causeway. They are separated from each other by alternate passages leading into extensive chambers, where the animals are killed. Down these passages you will generally see an open gutter, running with hot weltering blood in about equal quantities; the foul stream finds its way as it best can along the open street into the sewer. Up these passages, on Smithfield market days, beasts and sheep are goaded and driven by a set of boys and men, armed with sticks; you may imagine the difficulty there is in inducing the poor animals to enter; how they are beaten and tortured, as they "snuff the blood," and use every exertion, to the danger of possessions and the obstruction of carriages, to fly from that which their instinct teaches them is their passage to death.

There is no exaggeration in this. Driving cattle through the main streets is bad enough, and fraught with danger, but the natural instinct of the animal, which the smell of blood almost maddens, renders it nearly impossible to get them to enter these places without the exercise of cruelty, the tolerance of which is incredible in a country that has produced a Martin's Act. Of what avail is it that a solitary cabman or carter is now and then fined for ill-treating a horse, while such wholesale inhumanity is permitted? It is here the fussy inefficiency of Societies is displayed; their acts are all isolated; they can pounce upon an individual, but a system they cannot attack. "In these passages," says the writer:—

The smell baffles description; a heavy vapour rolling with the steam of repeated caresses, the interior of the vast hall beyond hung with the sides of beasts just slain, the pavement dripping with their gore, and ankle-deep in all the filth which necessarily accompanies the slaughtering process. But there seemed to be no sink, no deep drain to carry off the blood and manure, no proper receptacle for the offal and garbage. In the Parisian abattoirs, this necessary business is performed with the most scrupulous regard to humanity, as far as the beast is concerned, and to cleanliness; but, in London, we seem to have the essence of barbarity, from the moment the poor beast leaves its homestead until it is driven up the narrow passage, to have its brains scattered about; and hence the catastrophe occurs, it has been made to endure the horror of "snuffing blood" while it cools down, for it has been over-driven till its mouth is all foam, its sides pant, and its tongue hangs out.

Again:—

The Aldgate butchers are as careless about the outside as they are indifferent to the inside of the places where they transact their business. I have seen blood, black and clotted, in large heaps, in the gutter, in a summer sun; I have seen dogs lapping the warm, ruddy stream, from the slaughter-house; I have seen the entrails and manure lying just on the causeway, with infection and putridity on every side; and this within ten minutes' walk of the very heart of the city of London, in the very centre of its population, under the very nose of its Chief Magistrate!

The answer of the Chief Magistrate would be, that he has no power to interfere; but, of that plea, it is to be hoped, the new Bill will deprive him. At the same time, we must not expect impossibilities. No amount of regulation will do more than make those places a little less disgusting; and such regulation can only be tolerated for the time necessary to provide the means of doing this indispensable labour in a better manner. The places in which cattle are now slaughtered were, for the most part, private dwelling-houses, built with none of the arrangements required; they have been supplied by such adaptations of back yards and cellars, as were practicable—miserably imperfect, of course; but which must be used, till better are provided. These can only be found in a system of abbatoirs like those of Paris: something like them exists in the Government Victualling Yards.

We have not yet exhausted the objects of this Bill of much promise. Rooms are to be provided to which the bodies of the poor will be removed after death, to await interment; this will prevent that keeping of the dead among the living, which, in the crowded lodgings of the poor, has given rise to such shocking scenes. Another proposal is, that all buildings used for factories shall be so constructed as to consume the smoke of their own furnaces; we heartily wish the attempt may succeed, but we scarcely expect much improvement in this respect for sometime to come. A registry of the lodging houses of the poor, in order to regulate and restrict the number of inmates in one dwelling, is a wise and practical step; it was done long ago for omnibuses—why not for houses, where the proportion of numbers to space is still more important?

These are the main points of one Bill; the other is an application for similar powers, to be used for the better conservancy of the Thames, into which we shall, probably, deal hereafter.

These measures will, perhaps, be met by the old cry of too much interference; but it must not be allowed to succeed; to let things go on from bad to worse is impossible; and as to the necessity of action we cannot enforce it better than in the forcible language of Carlyle—

"Interference has begun; it must continue, must extensively engage itself, deepen and sharpen itself. Such things cannot longer be idly lapped in darkness, and suffered to go on unseen: the heavens do see them; the curse, not the blessing, of the heavens is on an earth that refuses to see them.

"Again, are not sanatory regulations possible for a Legislature? The old Romans had their Ædiles; who would, I think, in direct contravention to supply-and-demand, have rigorously seen rammed up into total abolition many a foul cellar in our Southwarks, Saint Gileses, and dark London-lanes; saying sternly, 'Shall a Roman man dwell there?' The Legislature, at whatever cost of consequences, would have had to answer, 'God forbid!'—The Legislature, even as it now is, could order all dingy manufacturing Towns to cease from their soot and darkness; to let in the blessed sunlight, the blue of heaven, and become clear and clean; to burn their coal-smoke, namely, and make flame of it; which, free air, a wholesome temperature, ceilings twenty feet high, might be ordained, by Act of Parliament, in all establishments licensed as mills. There are such mills already extant—honour to the builders of them! the Legislature can say to others: Go ye and do likewise; better—if you can."

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been chiefly remarkable for the sudden change of wind on Tuesday, and the sudden change of temperature at the same time: before morn on this day the temperature was above the average for the season, and after the change it was below. Rain sky has been mostly cloudy.

The following are some particulars of each day

Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and a thin rain was falling early in the morning; the direction of the wind was S.W.; and the average temperature for the day was 47°. Saturday, the sky was covered by clouds throughout the day, except during a part of the morning, when it was only partially covered; the direction of the wind was W.N.W.; and the average temperature for the day was 47½°. Sunday, the sky was overcast throughout the day; the direction of the wind was S.S.W.; and the average temperature for the day was 50°. Monday, the sky was covered by cloud till the evening, and it was partially free from cloud afterwards; the direction of the wind was W.; and the average temperature for the day was 53°. Tuesday, the sky was overcast till the evening, and at night it was free from cloud; at noon there was a considerable darkness, and it was necessary to use candles for a short time; and, during this darkness, the direction of the wind changed from the west to the north; the temperature during the morning rose higher than it became low, and its average for the whole day was 46°, being 7° less than it was the day preceding; before midnight the reading of the thermometer descended from 53° to 39°; a halo surrounded the moon during the early part of the evening, whose radius was 23½°. Wednesday, the sky was partially free from clouds during the morning, and again in the evening; at all other times it was mostly covered by clouds; the direction of the wind was N. and, at times, it blew strongly: the day was very cold; the reading of the thermometer did not rise above 43° during the day, and the average temperature for the day was 40½°; this day was, therefore, 13° colder than on Monday, and it is the coldest day since April 14, the night following was cold, with a keen wind, and the clouds passed the moon with great rapidity. Thursday, the sky was cloudless during the morning, and mostly so throughout the day, the direction of the wind was N.; this day was very cold; at 7 A.M. the reading of the thermometer was as low as 25°, and it did not rise above 41° throughout the day; the average temperature for the day was 36°, and it was the coldest day since the 15th of November. The average temperature of Monday, the 15th, exceeded that of this day by 18°. The average temperature for the week was 45½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Friday,	Nov. 12, the highest during the day was 50	deg., and the lowest was 44	deg.
Saturday,	Nov. 13	55	40
Sunday,	Nov. 14	55	45
Monday,	Nov. 15	57½	44½
Tuesday,	Nov. 16	53	29
Wednesday,	Nov. 17	43	28

COURT AND HAUT TON.

WINDSOR.—Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Albert take their accustomed walking exercise each morning, and the younger branches of the Royal Family their usual walking and pony exercise.

On Saturday, the Royal dinner party at the Castle included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Lord Chancellor and Lady Cottenham, the Earl and Countess Gray, Baroness de Speth, and the Earl of Desart.

On Sunday the Queen and Prince Albert, her Majesty's visitors, the Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court, and the domestic household, attended divine service in the private chapel of the Castle. The Hon. and Rev. C. L. Courtenay officiated. In the afternoon, at two o'clock, her Majesty and his Royal Highness, accompanied by the entire Court, walked along the eastern Terrace, and through the orangery as far as the Adelaide Lodge.

On Monday the Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Earl and Countess Grey, Baroness de Speth, the Earl of Desart, and the Rev. Dr. Hawtrey.

Tuesday, Prince Albert left the Castle early in the morning for town, travelling by the Great Western Railway, accompanied by Colonel Berkeley Drummond, General Bowles, and Captain the Hon. A. Gordon. His Royal Highness arrived at Buckingham Palace soon after nine o'clock, and proceeded, shortly before eleven, to Somerset House, to attend a meeting at the office of the Duchy of Cornwall. The Prince afterwards left for Windsor by a special train and arrived at the Castle about two o'clock P.M.

Wednesday, the Royal dinner party included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, their Royal Highnesses Princess Frederick of Hesse, the Marquis of Anglesey, Baroness de Speth (the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Cambridge), Lord and Lady Ashley, the Hon. Caroline Grey, and Lady Grey, Colonel Wylde, and Lieut. Gentleman in Waiting on the Duke of Cambridge.

Her Majesty and the Prince Consort, accompanied by the Royal Family, will take their departure from Buckingham Palace, on the present arrangements on Tuesday next, for the Isle of Wight. It is expected that the Court will remain at Osborne House, until Thursday, the 23rd of next month, when it will return to Windsor, to spend Christmas there.

Their Excellencies Prince Calimaki and Suleyman Pacha, accompanied by the Ottoman Consul-General, M. Zorab, and a small retinue, proceeded to Portsmouth on Tuesday afternoon, by the South Western Railway; and on Wednesday morning, a visit of inspection to the dockyard, victualling-yard, and the Royal yachts. Their Excellencies returned to town in the evening.

TOPICS IN THE ROYAL CIRCLE OF WALES.—Among the on dits, there is one to the effect that Dr. Philpott, Master of Catherine Hall, who performed the honours of Vice-Chancellor during the visit of her Majesty and Prince Albert at the late installation, is about to be appointed tutor to his Royal Highness the Prince of Wales.

DR. KAYE SHUTTLEWORTH.—This gentleman, the secretary of the Education Committee of the Privy Council, since his arrival in Edinburgh, has been afflicted with indisposition to an extent greatly interrupting his transaction of business. It is stated, as the result of some interviews between Dr. Shuttleworth and representatives of the parochial schoolmasters, that no arrangement is likely to be come to regarding that body.

THE ROYAL WORKS.—A quantity of plaster casts have arrived from one of the French ports, destined for the New Houses of Parliament. They have been forwarded from Paris to Mr. Barry, the architect, and consist of casts as specimens of architectural ornaments to be used in the erection and completion of the Royal works in progress at Westminster, and which are now in a very advanced state.

GOVERNMENT EMIGRATION.—Her Majesty's Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners have proposed that they will despatch a vessel, with two hundred emigrants, from Deptford, for Sydney, New South Wales, on the 20th of December; and a like number from Deptford, on the 28th of December, for Port Adelaide, South Australia. On Monday last, two hundred settlers for Otago and Wellington, New Zealand, left the Thames. They are the first persons who will locate on that newly-acquired settlement.

ETHERISATION SUPERSEDED.—Professor Simpson, of Edinburgh, has, in the trichloride of formyle, discovered an agent which more rapidly, pleasantly, and without communicating any offensive odour to the clothes of the patient, produces entire insensibility. No inhaler or instrument of any kind is necessary. A few drops put on a handkerchief, and thus applied to the mouth and nostrils, produce the desired effect in a few seconds. Last week Professor Simpson brought his discovery before the Medico-Chirurgical Society of Edinburgh.

POSTSCRIPT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

Their Lordships met to-day at two o'clock, when the Lords Commissioners, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Langdale, the Earl of Auckland, Lord Campbell, and Earl Grey, having taken their seats, the House of Commons was summoned to the bar, and the Marquis of Lansdowne communicated her Majesty's approval of the election of the House in electing the present Speaker.

The Speaker having acknowledged the high honour done him, and accepted, with all humility and gratitude, her Majesty's Royal will and pleasure, laid claim, on behalf of the Commons, by humble petition, to the free exercise of all their ancient and undoubted rights and privileges, more especially for freedom from arrest and molestation for themselves and their servants, freedom of debate, free access to her Majesty whenever occasion might require, &c. &c.

The Marquis of Lansdowne said the Lords Commissioners had a further command from her Majesty to confirm all the rights and privileges which had been granted to or claimed upon the Commons by any of her Majesty's loyal predecessors, in the most full and ample manner; and also to assure the right hon. gentleman, that although her Majesty was sensible he stood in no need of such assurance, her Majesty would put the most favourable construction on all his words and actions.

The Speaker of the Commons then withdrew.

After the oaths had been administered to several Peers, their Lordships adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. FRIDAY.

The House met to-day shortly after three o'clock.

The Speaker, on his return with several members from the Lords, whither the House had been summoned to hear the Royal Commission read, intimated that the Lords Commissioners had, in her Majesty's name, ratified the choice of her faithful Commons in the election of Speaker. (Loud cheers.) The right hon. gentleman also observed that the only business on that day would be, to administer the usual oaths to members.

The names of members were then called in the alphabetical order of counties and towns which respectively they represented, and the oaths administered.—Adjourned.

The Late Archbishop of York.—We understand that the Queen wrote with her own hands, a letter condolence to Miss Harcourt, the daughter of the late Archbishop of this diocese, on the demise of that lamented prelate. It is said that its sentiment and expression reflect the highest credit upon the intellectual powers as well as the amiable sensibilities of her Majesty's disposition.

The Lieutenant-Governorship of Guernsey.—Major General F. Napier, C.B., the Lieutenant-Governor of Guernsey, has resigned his appointment.

Death of Captain Grover.—We regret to have to announce the death, at Brussels, on the 5th instant, of Captain Grover, F.R.S., through whose exertions, a short time since, Dr. Wolff was enabled to go on his mission to Bokhara in search of the lamented officers Stoddart and Conolly.

Convocation of the Clergy.—A grand Convocation of the Clergy took place yesterday (Friday) in St. Paul's Cathedral. The great doors at the west end of the Cathedral were thrown open soon after eleven o'clock, and the Bishops of Hereford and Rochester, the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, the advocates, proctors, and other officers of Doctors' Commons, and a number of the clergy, walked in procession up the centre aisle, preceded by the vergers. The service was then read in Latin by the Bishop of Hereford, and a Latin sermon was preached by Dr. Jelf, the Principal of King's College. After which the procession was again formed, and the Convocation quitted the Cathedral.

The New Houses of Parliament.—A notice has been issued from the Lord Chamberlain's Office, dated Thursday last, to the effect that tickets to see the new House of Lords, in the place of Westminster, will be issued from the Lord Great Chamberlain's Office, every Wednesday, between the hours of eleven and four o'clock, for the subsequent or any other Saturday. Each ticket will admit the bearer and one other person. All applications must be made personally, or through a responsible agent. Persons receiving tickets will be required to leave their names and address, written on a card, at the office. Tickets will be admitted on Saturday only, between the hours of ten and four o'clock. Saturday, the 27th inst., will be the first day for the admission of tickets.

The Birmingham Memorial. The memorial which has been prepared by the Committee of the Birmingham Currency Association, in compliance with the resolution of the public meeting held in the Town Hall in that borough on Friday, the 5th inst., was forwarded yesterday (Friday) to Lord J. Russell for presentation to her Majesty.

The Late Mysterious Death of Mr. Nelme in Hackney.—Thursday afternoon the inquiry was resumed for the sixth time, before Mr. Baker, Churchstreet, Hackney, and the Coroners for Middlesex, Mr. Wakley, who died on the 27th ult., from the effects of arsenic. Mrs. Mary Louisa Allnutt, a widow, stated that she was the daughter of the deceased, and resided at her father's late residence in Grove-place, Hackney. Her husband, William Allnutt, had a severe fall when he was eighteen months old, and afterwards suffered from inflammation of the brain. He had also had bad health, and frequently complained of his head. Witness had seen a great alteration in her father's health during the seven months. The witness then repeated the evidence respecting the deceased being sick in his garden on the morning of the 27th of September last, which has already been reported. She further stated that, about three weeks before the death, she asked her what arsenic was like, and she told him it was like flour. Witness vomited very much on the evening, before the death of the deceased, after she had sweetened some gruel with sugar contained in the vessel, and swallowed it.—Inspector Waller, in answer to a question put to him by Mr. Ballantine, said, he apprehended William Allnutt, junior, he said, "Pray forgive me. I was tempted to do it. Witness asked him who had put him, and he said he person tempted him, but a voice appeared to him to say, "Do it—do it; you will not be discovered." The jury then summed up, and the jury, after a short deliberation, returned a verdict of "Wilful Murder" against William Allnutt.

LATEST FOREIGN NEWS.

SPAIN.

Accounts from Madrid to the 12th instant represent that M. Bravo Murillo is appointed Minister of Public Instruction, and General Manuel de la Concha is gazetted Ambassador at Paris.

The Cortes was to open on the 15th. It was said that M. Mon was to be elected President of the Chamber of Deputies.

WEST INDIES.

The Dee arrived at Southampton from the West Indies at noon yesterday (Friday). She brings intelligence of a hurricane which took place in the island of Tortuga, on the 11th of October, by which seventeen lives were lost, and nearly 800 houses and public works either destroyed or injured, as also most shipping. It is supposed that Trinidad has also suffered.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

Seaver Captured.—Her Majesty's brig Contest, Commander M'Murdo, has captured a fine slaver schooner, the Esperanza, of 120 tons (Brazilian), with 217 slaves on board. The prize has been sent to Sierra Leone. The Contest was at Lozngo, on the 9th Aug. Five slavers had been captured in three weeks on the South Coast, and three in the Bights of Benin.

The Army in Ireland.—The army in Ireland, for November, 1847, consists of ten regiments of Cavalry:—viz., 3d Dragoon Guards, 6th Dragoon Guards, 1st Royal Dragoons, 2d Royal North British Dragoons, 4th (Queen's Own) Light Dragoons, 5th Inniskilling Dragoons, 7th (Queen's Own) Hussars, 8th (Royal Irish) Hussars, 13th Light Dragoons, and 17th Lancers; two troops of Royal Horse Artillery, 10 companies of Royal Artillery (battalion with field batteries and officers of Royal Engineers); 23 regiments of Infantry—viz., 1st (Queen's Royals), 3rd Buffs, 6th (Royal Regiment of Foot), 13th Light Infantry, 26th (Cameronians), 30th (or 41st Foot), 44th, 47th, 48th, 49th, 56th, 59th, 64th, 67th (1st battalion), 67th (2nd battalion), 68th Light Infantry, 70th, 74th, Highlanders, 75th, 82nd, 85th Light Infantry, and 92nd Highlanders; 14 depôts of Infantry Regiments, 7th (Royal Fusiliers), 15th, 16th, 19th, 24th, 38th, 54th, 66th, 72nd (Highlanders), 78th (Highlanders), 88th (Connaught Rangers), and 98th; forming an effective force of 28,500 rank and file of all arms, with 21,682 enrolled pensioners and staffs of militia corps.

Charge of Collusion with Smugglers against the Coast-Guard.—An inquiry of three days' duration, at the Dover Custom-house, touching the conduct of the members of the Coast-Guard at the Townsend station, viz., chief boatman Rule and — Fox, terminated on Thursday (last week). The charge against the men were, that Fox had left his guard while a boat, laden with contraband goods, was worked, and that Rule was implicated in the transaction. The accused parties have been suspended, and the evidence has been sent to the central board in London, who will decide definitively what course is to be pursued towards the men.

Military Ball at Windsor.—It is always a gratifying circumstance to witness a good and kindly feeling existing between the commissioned and non-commissioned officers in her Majesty's service. A ball was given on Wednesday evening, at the Hope Inn, Frogmore-road, by the Colonel and officers of the Royal Horse Guards (Blue), to the non-commissioned officers of the Regiment, and their wives and friends, the number present being upwards of one hundred and fifty, including several of the Windsor tradesmen. Several of the officers were also present, and joined in the dance. The band of the Regiment performed during the evening.

Sir C. Napier and his Pension from Portugal.—Sir C. Napier has written to the Times, in reply to an article published in that paper on the 19th ult. The gallant officer denies that he "ever mentioned the subject of the pension to the Minister of Finance, and, upon his regretting that it was in arrear, begged that no favour might be shown him." His affidavits, however, that his agent had received four months pension, and states that there are still thirteen due. It is, we believe, undoubted that the pension of every other British subject having claims on Portugal, from the Duke of Wellington downwards, is at least eighteen months in arrear, and that, for that period, no Portuguese public servant has received his pay. We are glad (observes the Times) to find, however, that Sir C. Napier intends no appeal to the sympathies of the public on him, but we still cannot help regarding the acceptance of any favour by an officer holding the position in respect to the Portuguese Government which the Admiral of the British fleet in the Tagus occupies, as a subject of unqualified regret.

The vacancy created by the retirement of Mr. Gatty, the Taxing Master, has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Joseph Parkes, who has been for many years solicitor to the Charity Commission

At a meeting of the South Cheshire Agricultural Society, held at Crewe, last week, a resolution was passed to the effect, that the operations of the Society should in future be extended over the whole county.

METROPOLITAN NEWS.

PUBLIC MEETINGS.

The Sanatory Condition of the Country.—A crowded public meeting, in favour of an effective and comprehensive sanatory bill, took place on Monday evening, at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, under the auspices of the following associations:—Health of Towns, National Philanthropic, Health of London, City and Liberty of Westminster, and the Working Men's Association. The chair was taken by Mr. Benjamin Lund Cabbell, who was supported by Mr. Mackinnon, M.P.; Mr. Chas. Lushington, M.P.; Sir Chas. Aldis, &c. &c. &c. The Chairman observed that, as the Government had taken up the question of sanatory reform honestly and fairly, it was the first thing that these societies should meet and pass some distinct resolution by which all their powers might be concentrated to the more effectual support of the Legislature in their exertions towards the end sought by all. The Chairman then read a long and comprehensive report, which had been framed with a view to that effect. Mr. Mackinnon then moved the following resolution:—"That the drainage and sewage of the metropolis are very insufficient for cleansing of the sewers generally; and that the supply of water lamentably deficient in quantity, and bad in quality; that the practice of burying the dead in the midst of the living produces great demoralisation, and greatly violates the sanctity of the grave. That these, among other evils, entail enormous and unnecessary expenses upon the people, and lead to a great deterioration of health, and fearful destruction of life." Carried unanimously.—A second resolution was also passed, deploring the general apathy on the subject, and the absence of an uniform law which would give the Government an efficient control over local administrative bodies; and pledging the meeting to support the Government in any efforts made by it to pass a sound and comprehensive sanatory measure.—The meeting, having been addressed by several eminent men of science and experience on the subject, separated.

The People's International League.—On Monday a crowded meeting was held at the Crown and Anchor Tavern, Strand, for the purpose of hearing an explanation of the principles and objects of the "People's International League." Amongst those on the platform were Colonel Thompson, M.P.; Mr. George Thompson, M.P., Mr. Williams, M.P.; Mr. P. A. Taylor, jun., &c. The chair was taken by Dr. Bowring, M.P. The principles and objects of the League may be gathered from the resolutions adopted by the meeting, which set forth the propriety of obtaining full intelligence upon all matters bearing on the conduct and policy of the Government, whether at home or abroad, our relations with foreign nations, and their political and financial manifestations and progress, as also of bringing to bear upon the foreign policy of this country the beneficial influence of public opinion, by circulating accurate and systematic information respecting the political movements and progress of foreign countries; and by promoting a good understanding between the people of this and all other countries.

National Anti-Gold-Law League.—The sixth meeting of this Association was held on Monday night, at the London Coffee-house, Ludgate-hill, Mr. Frasi Bennoch in the Chair. The Chairman opened the proceedings of the evening by observing that the object which the League had in view was a good one, a safe, and a sufficient circulating medium to float the manufacturing enterprise of this country. The only question which they had to decide was, what the circulating medium should be. The gentleman which the League had provided was that there was no necessity that a circulating medium should possess an intrinsic value—and this principle was opposed by the bullionists. The speaker, in the course of his observations, considered fully into the consideration of the questions affecting the article of gold in its three-fold capacity—as a commodity, as the standard of value, and as a circulating medium; and some other persons, including Mr. Chisholm Anstey, M.P., having delivered their sentiments on the objects of the League, the meeting terminated.

Mr. Ferrand and Mr. Cornewall Lewis.—In Michaelmas Term, 1846, a rule for a criminal information was granted by the Court of Queen's Bench, on the application of Mr. G. C. Lewis, then one of the Central Poor-Law Commissioners, and now member for Herefordshire, and Secretary to the Board of Control, against Mr. W. B. Ferrand, the late member for Knaresborough, for certain charges affecting Mr. Lewis, contained in two letters written by Mr. Ferrand, and published by his desire in the Times, in August, 1846. The matter has been recently arranged through the intervention of friends.—Lord John Manners acting for Mr. Ferrand, and Mr. Hayward (Queen's Counsel) for Mr. Lewis; and the charges in question have been withdrawn.

Apothecaries' Hall.—The prizes annually awarded by the Society of Apothecaries to medical students for proficiency in Botany and Materia Medica were, on Wednesday last, presented by Mr. E. Bean, the Master of the Society, to the successful candidates. Mr. J. S. Bristow, of St. Thomas's Hospital, received the botanical gold medal; Mr. G. T. Jones, of University College, the botanical silver medal and prize books; and Mr. William Raydon, of University College, received a botanical prize of books. Mr. J. W. B. Sloggett, of Charing-cross Hospital, received the materia medica gold medal; and Mr. B. Davies, of University College, the materia medica silver medal. The examination for the botanical prizes had been conducted by Mr. N. B. Ward; and the examination for the materia medica prizes by Dr. Copland.

Churches and Chapels.—At the sitting of the Incorporated Society for Promoting the Enlargement, Building, and Repairing of Churches and Chapels, on Monday last, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Bart., M.P., in the chair, several grants in aid were made both for rebuilding and repairing sacred edifices throughout the country.

Meeting of Master Printers.—A special general meeting of master printers was held on Tuesday, at Anderton's Hotel, Fleet street, to receive the report of the Committee of Conference appointed at the general meeting held on the 22nd of May last, "to settle all matters now in dispute, or not touched upon, or not clearly stated in the scale of 1805-10;" and also to receive a recommendation as to the formation of a Committee of Reference, for all such matters. From the report adopted, it appears that the scale of prices for compositors' work had been satisfactorily settled between the delegates of the masters and men; and a resolution was passed recommending two gentlemen to attend at a public office throughout the trade, for the use respectively of the masters and compositors. A resolution was also passed for the appointment of a Committee of Reference of twelve master printers (six to be chosen by the Committee sitting for the purpose of settling any disputes relative to work which may not have been apprehended in the preparation of the scale of prices; and to interpret any disputed point in the scale.

Marylebone Vestry.—The Public Health.—On Saturday, Mr. George Dashwood brought up the reports of the committees nominated to inquire into the health of the five districts. The report stated that these comprised 583 streets and ways, the cleansing of which, for the last ten years, cost £43,077; and their lighting, which was effected by 3150 lamps, cost, for the same period, £11,200; and the paving, &c., £178,117; and that the small dwellings in the parish were erected without any regard for either the health or comfort of the inhabitants. In some instances, 24 rooms, containing 121 inhabitants, had only one yard and one cistern for their general use; and in other cases, the houses had neither back nor sinking yards, nor back entrances. In 280 streets, the sewerage was all but neglected. The several committees strongly recommended a reform in the mode of sewerage, supplying water, lighting, and ventilating; and that burials should be done away with in the parish.—Mr. Staunford then brought up the report of the committee appointed to adopt measures for the suppression of vagrancy. The report stated that the committee had, with the Clerk to the Vestry, who promised to second their views. They had no dependence for assistance from the police magistrates, who only committed two-thirds of 42,000 persons passing, &c., £178,117; and that the small dwellings in the parish were erected without any regard for either the health or comfort of the inhabitants. They had no dependence for assistance from the police magistrates, who only committed two-thirds of 42,000 persons brought before them. Amongst other suggestions recommended the appointment of special constables, in coloured clothes, to watch and arrest vagrants. The report was received.

Distress in Lambeth.—On Tuesday evening a preliminary meeting of gentlemen resident in Lambeth took place, at the Horns Tavern, for the purpose of raising a subscription to mitigate, in the approaching season of winter, the sufferings of the poor of the locality, which have been caused by the depression of trade and the high price of provisions during the past season. The parties have formed themselves into a committee to carry this benevolent object into effect, and have put themselves in communication with the committee at every parish in the parish, with the view of inducing them to contribute pecuniary aid towards their charitable design.

Abolition of the Smithfield Market.—On Saturday last the requisite notices of intended application to the ensuing session of Parliament to empower the New Smithfield Market and Abattoir Company to establish public slaughterhouses for the supply of meat, &c., to the centre of London and Westminster, were given by that company. The act proposes to establish seven public abattoirs and cattle markets, the principal one to be between Camden-town and Maiden-lane, one at Kensington, another at Paddington, Islington, Bethnal-green, Battersea; to make the slaughtering of beasts at any other place unlawful within the circle of London and Westminster, and proper regulations to be enforced, and inspectors appointed to destroy unwholesome meat.

The re-paving of Lombard-street with wood was proposed, on Tuesday, before the City Commissioners of Sewers. It was opposed by Sir Peter Laurie, but strongly supported by others; and was carried by a very large majority—27 to 5. The cost will be about £900; but the bankers residing in that street have undertaken to defray one-third of the expense of the new pavement.

The City County Court.—On Saturday last Mr. Commissioner Bullock had no fewer than 103 cases to dispose of, and, by his decisions and impartiality, gave much satisfaction in almost every case. The oppressive creditor and the dishonest debtor being the only parties to find fault.

Shooting in Gen Urquhart.—On Saturday, the 6th inst., Lord Feldhaven gave a banquet in the principal covers surrounding the House of Balmacaan. The party were in all four guns, viz.—his Lordship, the George Stuart, Brodie Dunn, Esq., of Milton Brodie, and Francis Palmer, Esq. The sport commenced shortly after eight o'clock, and between that hour and four, the party bagged 315 head, consisting of pheasants, hares, rabbits, and twelve roe deer.

Influence of the Press.—On Friday se'nnight a fellow, named David Gregg, was convicted before Mr. Sergeant Adams of having ill-used a respectable married female, named Morris. After the verdict had been recorded, Mr. Sergeant Adams turned to Mr. Hector Rose, a magistrate, who sat beside him, and said, "Now, what's to be done with him?" "Give him fourteen days," said Mr. Rose. "No," said Mr. Sergeant Adams, "he must have more than that, or there will be a shower of leaders in the press about it." This was said in a tone which, while it was intended to have been heard only by Mr. Rose, audibly reached the reporters: it is a striking proof of the influence of the press. The fellow was sen to Bridewell for a month.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE DOWAGER LADY FORTESCUE.

The Right Honourable Hester Countess Fortescue, was third daughter of the famous politician, George Grenville, and sister of George, first Marquis of Buckingham. Her Ladyship was born the 30th November, 1760; she married the 10th May, 1782, Hugh, third Baron and first Earl Fortescue, by whom she had three sons and four daughters. The present Earl is her eldest son, and among her daughters are Lady King, Lady Newton Fellowes, Lady Ann Wilbraham, Lady Williams, and Lady Courtenay. The Countess Dowager Fortescue died on the 13th instant, after a prolonged illness, at Meare Gifford, the family seat, in Devonshire, at the advanced age of nearly 87.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL NEWBERRY.

This distinguished officer entered the British service in 1794, and rose through the various grades to that of a Lieutenant-General in 1830. In 1842, he also received the Colonelcy of the 3rd Dragoon Guards. General Newberry acted in Ireland during the rebellion of 1798, and was present at the engagement with the rebels, and the French at Ballinamuck. In 1816, he commanded the first Cavalry brigade at the siege and capture of Huttras. Again, in 1817 and 1818, he superintended the proceedings of the Cavalry of the left division of the Marquis of Hastings's gallant army, which was the first engaged with the Pindarees, and he took the whole of their baggage and camp. He was subsequently removed to the command of the Cavalry, with a light division, under Major-General Sir Thomas Brown, and captured at one fort nine pieces of artillery, and took prisoner the Artillery General; he was afterwards present at several severe and successful attacks on the enemy's troops. The whole period of General Newberry's service comprised 53 years. This gallant veteran died on the 9th inst., at Wiesbaden, aged 70.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

SHIPWRECK AND DREADFUL LOSS OF LIFE.

A letter of the 12th inst., from Skibbereen, Ireland, thus announces the wreck of the packet-ship Stephen Whitney, and loss of ninety-one souls. "The Stephen Whitney, Captain Holdridge, from New York to Liverpool, was totally wrecked on the West Calf (an island near Skull), on the 10th inst., at 10 P.M.; the master, Popham, drowned. She had on board a general cargo. Crew and passengers, 110; 91 lost—viz., 76 passengers; 15 steerage and crew. Twenty were females, and three children. The names of the cabin passengers lost are, Mrs. Thom, English; Mr. Roberts, New York merchant; Mr. M'Cabe, American; Dr. Sweeney, Irish; Mr. Judge, Welsh; Mr. Robinson, Liverpool. Part of the cotton has been brought into Skull."

The Stephen Whitney was a splendid vessel, of 1084 tons burden, and belonged to the class of packet-ships commonly called "the Red Star Line," of which Messrs. Thos. and Joseph Sands and Co., of Liverpool, are the consignees. She was built in New York, about seven years ago, and took the place of the packet-ship St. Andrew, which was wrecked off this port in the memorable gale of January, 1839. The late commander of the Stephen Whitney, Captain C. W. Popham, was highly respected, and was an active and a skilful navigator. He was for some years chief officer of the ill-fated ship, when under the charge of Captain W. C. Thompson, and succeeded to the command about two years ago, on that gentleman resigning to superintend the construction of the screw steam-ship Sarah Sands.

The unfortunate packet-ship left New York on the evening of the 15th ult., with 110 passengers and crew on board. Subsequently, on the 22d ult., she was spoken by the packet-ship Sea, and during several days, until the 27th, the two ships sailed in company. They then parted, in lat. 41, long. 49. The Sea arrived in the Mersey on Thursday last, but so late as Saturday night no accounts were received of the Stephen Whitney.

The manner of the unfortunate occurrence was this:—Captain Popham, having run close on the land, mistook the lighthouse of Crookhaven for that of the Old Head of Kinsale, and under this erroneous impression bore away and went ashore. In ten minutes she went to pieces. All the female passengers, it is said, were to be drowned; the second mate shared the same fate. The Inspector and Collector of Customs rendered all assistance in their power; and 19 lives were saved.

Nine years back, a similar fate attended another ship upon the same spot—the Lady Flora Hastings, we believe; and on that occasion every soul perished.

The vessel was of the usual construction of about 1000 bushels or corn, 1000 bales of cotton, 100 boxes of cheese, 400 barrels of rosin, 20 bales of clocks, and the other articles which may be comprised in a general cargo.

The names of the survivors of passengers and crew are given as follows:—Crew: Thomas Allen, a native of Connecticut, first mate of the vessel; James D. Mackey, third mate; William Johnson, a native of Yorkshire; Joseph Miller, native of Connecticut, steward of the vessel; John Smith, an American; David Ferguson, a native or Glasgow; William Smith, of Baltimore, U.S.; Henry Hunre, Fife, Scotland; Daniel Greaves, Johnstown, Scotland; Thomas Jackson, Boston, U.S.; Gabriel Pearson, New York; George Prince, New York; James Saunders, an American; Adolphus Jackson, New York. The passengers who escaped were: Edward Ekin, a native of Movil, county Donegal; James M'Glaskey, of Derry; Joseph Butler, city of Dublin; and Patrick Peterson, Roscrea, county Tipperary.

ROBBERY AT THE GREAT WESTERN RAILWAY STATION.

One of the most daring robberies ever perpetrated in the metropolis, involving the loss of a large amount of property, took place at the Great Western Railway Station on the evening of Sunday last.

It should be stated in explanation, that the booking-offices for first and second-class passengers run parallel with each other, both being entered by isolated doors from the front yard, and both affording distinct egress on to the platform from which the trains start. The two offices communicate with each other by a pair of folding doors, the clerks in each being thus enabled to pass to and fro without leaving their positions behind the counters over which the money is paid. The egress on to the platform from the second-class booking-office is by a single wooden door, which at night are fastened by a single bolt from the inside, running up into the top of the door-frame. The inner platform being considered quite private, no more secure fastening to the door has been deemed necessary, and, indeed, from the very fact of the two doors not meeting in the centre, nothing was more easy than to unfasten this bolt from the outside; thus, any person having once g t upon the platform, might with ease, by the insertion of a crow-bar or some such instrument, obtain admittance to the booking-office. This is exactly what appears to have been done. As the most opportune moment for the perpetration of the robbery, the thieves appear to have selected the period of the arrival of the 1 ct train on Sunday night, viz., half-past ten o'clock, when all the booking-clerks and other officers, with the exception of the few whose duty it is to receive the in-coming train, had left. The thieves, no doubt, had previously secreted themselves among the carriages always remaining about the station, and there is every reason to believe that they did not commence operations until all the officers of the company were busy in attending to the passengers arriving by the up-train. They appear, then, having obtained admittance as above described into the second-class booking-office, to have gone behind the counter, and, forcing in succession of the tills (six in number) open, and to have cleared them of their contents. This done, they passed into the first-class office, where they did precisely the same thing, every one of the drawers in both offices being forcibly wrenched open. In the right hand extremity of the first-class booking-office is a small c ost, containing, as it was said, where the money taken during the day is placed when not convenient to send it to the bankers, as on Sunday night, for instance; this safe stood on a pair of brackets. Here also all articles of value sent for transmission by train are generally placed pending their despatch. This closet was fastened by a common lock, which yielded readily enough to an iron wrench, and from it they removed bodily the safe, which contained no less than £1200 in gold, being the proceeds of the preceding day's traffic. They then, it is supposed, carried their load back into the second-class office, the front door of which they unlocked and let themselves out. In addition to the £1500 cash, the safe contained a large quantity of railway securities, the property of the chief booking clerk. In the closet with the safe were two sacks of bullion, each insured for a large amount. Happily, these were untouched. The Forresters are in pursuit of the gang of villains who has yet been obtained. It is feared the robbers were well acquainted with the internal arrangements of the office.

Destruction of a Pianoforte Manufactory.—On Tuesday night, shortly after eleven o'clock, a fire, involving a serious destruction of valuable property, broke out in the pianoforte manufactory belonging to Messrs. Tolfrey and Sons, in Wardour-street, Soho, which were almost in Wardour-mews, where they had a frontage of nearly 70 feet, extending backwards to Wardour-street, and were well stored with goods, some finished, and others partially so. The discovery was made by police-constable C 136, who perceived a dense mass of black smoke issuing from the windows. The engines of the London Brigade, parish, West of England, and County offices, quickly arrived, and were forthwith put into operation. The fire, however, had got too strong a hold to be easily subdued. The inhabitants of Wardour-street and Noel-street, being apprehensive that their own habitations would be consumed, removed their furniture into the open street, a large proportion of which was carried away by the crowd, notwithstanding the exertions of the police. By half-past twelve o'clock the fire was so far subdued as to allay all fears of its further extension. The damage appears to be confined principally to the manufactory in which the flames commenced.

Sudden Death of Sergeant Armourer in the Grenadier Guards.—An inquest was held on Thursday afternoon, upon the body of Mr. Thomas Cracknell, aged 63 years, Sergeant Armourer at the Infantry Barracks, Windsor, who expired suddenly in bed that morning of Noel-street, Soho. It appeared from the evidence that the deceased had died of apoplexy, caused by an effusion of blood to the brain. The Jury returned a verdict accordingly.

Revision of the Metropolitan Building Act.—A committee, privately nominated by Lord Morpeth, to consider the more glaring evils of the Buildings Act, has had several meetings. It consists of Mr. Hosking, Mr. Poynter, and Mr. Shaw, the official referees; Mr. Fowler and Mr. Hutchison, on the part of the district surveyors; and Mr. Biers and Mr. Piper, on the part of the builders.

Fire in Great Ealing.—On Monday morning, between two and three o'clock, a fire, attended with considerable loss of property, broke out upon the premises belonging to Mr Hall, a marine store-dealer, at Great Ealing, near the church. In the space of a few minutes the building, from bottom to top, presented one immense sheet of fire. Upon the engines arriving, the building was almost gutted, and the only water that could be obtained was from a pump some distance off. Mr. Hall's stock is totally destroyed. Some of the neighbours will also be serious losers by the fire.

SOUTH SEA WHALE FISHING.—DRAWN BY DUNCAN.

STUPENDOUS SUSPENSION BRIDGE IN HUNGARY.

This vast bridge is in course of construction across the Danube, at Pesth, the greatest commercial town, and the most populous city, in Hungary. The great work is from the design of Mr. Tierney Clark. It is 1200 feet in length, in three spans; the centre span being 600 feet, and the side spans 300 feet each. (The centre span of the great Menai-bridge is 560 feet.) The granite for the piers was brought in immense blocks, some of them from 12 to 16 tons weight each, rom Linz, in Upper Austria. The superstructure—the arches crossing the roadway, and the lodges—as our Illustration shows, will be of very handsome design; and the quays of approach will be in corresponding style.

The chains have been made in England; the contractor for the coffer-dams was an Englishman, as were, also, the principal workmen; and all the machinery has been supplied from this country. The total cost of the Bridge we understand will be £600,000.

SPERM WHALE FISHING.

DRAWN BY DUNCAN.

The chase and capture of the Sperm Whale present many striking scenes for the pencil; but, probably, none more effective than that chosen by the artist in the present instance—the Whale in his "flurry," or dying. Mr. Beale, in his excellent "Natural History of the Sperm Whale," gives a very graphic account of the affair.

STUPENDOUS SUSPENSION BRIDGE OVER THE DANUBE, AT PESTH, IN HUNGARY.

We take up the narrative at the point when the Whale, not having had all his "spoutings out," had risen again to finish them; when one of the party passing quickly to the bows of the boat, he stood to way-lay him as he came careering along, throwing his enormous head completely out of the water, for he was now "gallied," or frightened. He soon came, and caught a sight of the boat, just as he got within dart; the vast animal rolled itself over in an agony of fear to alter its course; but it was too late, the harpoon was hurled with excellent aim, and was plunged deeply into his side, near the fin. The completion of his destruction, however, was a work of considerable difficulty, the Whale continuing to descend the moment either of the boats got nearly within dart of him. But, after an hour's exertion this way, six out of the ten boats which were engaged, got fast to him by their harpoons, but not one of them could get near enough to give him a fatal lance; he towed them all in various directions for some time, taking care to descend below the surface the moment a boat drew up over his flukes, or otherwise drew near, which rendered it almost impossible to strike him in the body, even when the lance was darted, although the after part of his "small" was perforated in a hundred places: from these wounds the blood gushed in considerable quantities, and as the poor animal moved along, towing the boats, he left a long ensanguined stain in the ocean. At last, becoming weak from his numerous and deep wounds, he grew less capable of avoiding his foes, which gave an opportunity for one of them to pierce him to the life!—dreadful was that moment the acute pain which the Leviathan experienced, and which roused the dormant energies of his gigantic frame. As the life's blood gurgled thick through the nostrils, the immense creature went into his "flurry" with excessive fury; and the boats were speedily steered off while he beat the water in his dying convulsions with a force that appeared to shake the firm foundation of the ocean!

The ships in the distance of the picture are "cutting in," and "trying out." The first process is bringing the whale alongside the ship, and "cutting in," by means of instruments, called "spades," until the whole of the blubber is stripped off to the tail or flukes; the head being cut off in the beginning of the process. The "blanket pieces," which are cut from the long strips of fat or blubber, then pass through different processes in the "trying out," or extracting the oil by heat.

These operations are not attended with any unpleasant smell, and are very quickly performed; and eighty barrels of oil may be stowed away in the hold of the ship in less than three days after the destruction of the animal.

MUSIC.

Drury Lane Theatre.—The termination of the Promenade Concerts is announced for this evening (the 20th), and M. Jullien will give his Bal Masque on Monday next. M. Berlioz has been zealously employed in preparing for the opening of the operatic campaign, the first or second week in December. Mdme. Dorus Gras is expected in town daily. The rehearsals for "Lucia" have been carried on, with Mr. Reeves as the Edgardo.

Foreign Musical News.—(From our own Correspondent).—Paris, Wednesday.—It is reported that MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan have determined that Miss Birch shall make her début in the ensuing week; but my belief is, that this ill-used vocalist, disgusted at the treatment she has received, will throw up her engagement, rather than now trust herself to the tender mercies of a French managerial claque. Verdi's "Jerusalem" ("I Lombardi"), is announced for Monday next; and Auber's "Ayâd," at the Opéra-Comique, for the end of the month. Adolphe Adam's new theatre the Théatre National, was opened on Monday night. At the Italiens, Grisi electrified the audience on Saturday night, in "Gemma di Vergy," in which Gardoni and Ronconi had parts. Mdlle. Alboni has been engaged by M. Vatel, for December, January, and February. She is expected at the close of the month, and will appear as Arsace in "Semiramide." "La Donna del Lago," and "Cenerattola," will be got up for Alboni. In March she will return to the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden. Bellini's "Pirata" is in rehearsal for Madame Castellan, Coletti, and Marin. Mozart's "Nozze di Figaro" will be given with Grisi, Madame Castellan, and Mdlle. Corbari, Coletti, Lablache, Cellini, Tagliafico, and Polonini. Coletti is to sing in the "Due Foscari," and Ronconi in "Nabucco" (Nino.) Mercadante's "Bravo" has been withdrawn from rehearsal, and will not be done. Cerito and St. Leon are drawing great houses at the Grand Opera. Flora Fabbri, and her cara sposa, M. Ernéen, have returned to the Académie, after a brilliant campaign in Italy. M. Silvain is in Paris, after a tour with Lucile Grahn, who is also here. Carlotta Grisi is starring in Brussels. Rosati will make her début here in a few days. Marie Taglioni is the delight of the Viennese amateurs. Felicien David has announced a concert at the Conservatoire, for the 12th of December, to perform his "Moïse au Sinaï," which he has entirely rewritten. Meyerbeer, the composer of the "Huguenots," "Robert le Diable," &c., is in Paris for some days. The Académie is trying to obtain an opera from him; but he has required, as a sine qua non, Madame Viardot Garcia and Mario, both of whom are engaged for London, for 1848 and 1849. Viardot was to have appeared at Dresden on Monday night. Mdme. Tadolini is engaged at her Majesty's Theatre for next season. Mr. Lumley was at Milan at the last advices Signora Zoïa is creating a great sensation in Italy by her performance in Donizetti's "Figlia del Reggimento"—she plays the drum to perfection. Lortzing's new opera of "Undine" is the rage in Germany. Mdlle. Jenny Lind is now at Stockholm, reposing after her brilliant achievements in England and Germany. Mr. Mitchell is still in Paris, making preparations for his season at the St. James's Theatre. Two danseuses, Mdlles. Louise and Nathalie Fitzjames, have been performing, with immense success, in the French provinces, in Perrot's ballet, "Le Debre d'un Peintre." Coppola's new opera of "Fingal," produced at Palermo, was a failure, some attempts at imitations of a storm provoking a tempest on the part of the public.

FINE ARTS.

THE SISTERS.

THE SISTERS.*

Met in the time of Life's young confidence,
To ponder o'er their secrets of the heart,
And revel in the sweet and solemn sense
Of Sisters' truth—exchanged without an art.
A full and free disclosure of the soul
Each to the other;—so that both may share
The happy thought, that brings a bright control,
The gushing sorrow, or the silent care!

So that, if one dear Sister be too glad
With sunny bliss, the other's heart, to-day,
Shall cease beneath her sunshine—to be sad,
And catch some gleaming from the happy ray!
Yes! if the other melancholy wear;
Bathed in the sunshine of a sister's bliss
The Joy of Love shall snatch away the care,
And drown the sorrow in a sunny kiss!

So if one grieve—and have or grief deep cause,
The other glad,—and with gay tune for gladness;
The glad,—by sympathy's fond mutual laws,
Will hide her joy, and wear her sister's sadness.
Each of the other is a living part,
And, ready for the other's sweet receiving,
Keeps the affections of her gentle heart
Truthful alike for gladness or for grieving!

This is a holy interchange of Love
Which only Sisters know—(unless, indeed,
We name that higher fountain from above,
Which rolls life's river through its fairest mead;
And flows in filial streams, and interweaves
Parents' and Children's feelings, gushing free—
Making the green, young glory of the leaves
Seem as it only grew to bless the tree!)

Yes! Sister's Love is of the holiest kind;
Blended without a single false desire,—
No Passion-God, with his own madness blind
(Like the young Phœnix sprung from Cupid's fire),
But of the chaste, the beautiful, the fair,
With force of kindred shining in its eyes—
Soft as a whisper, solemn as a prayer,
And clear as moonbeams under Summer skies!

Here are two Sisters whom fond Art would prove Young Sybils of the Soul,—of such a kind
Discoursing with the beauty of such Love,
And with such gentle truthfulness of mind!
Mixing the confidence of trusting hearts
Reciprocating Hope or Joy, or sorrow;
And both prepared to blend the changing parts
Of One's to-day or of the other's morrow!

THE THEATRES.

HAYMARKET.

An admirable two-act comic drama, called "The Roused Lion," was produced here with signal success on Monday evening, and promises to be repeated to full audiences for many nights. So ingeniously is it constructed, that it is scarcely possible to detail its plot under more space than our columns afford, but we will endeavour to give an outline of it. Ernest de Fonblanche (Mr. Howe) has fallen in love with a very pretty girl, whom he has seen through a lorgnette at an opposite house; and, at the desire of a roué friend, Gustave d' Herbelin (Mr. H. Vandenhoff), asks her to a dinner he is about to give some "demireps" of his acquaintance. Great preparations are made for this festival, in the middle of which Ernest's godfather, Stanislaus de Fonblanche (Mr. Webster), from whom he has great expectations, arrives in Paris, from the provinces. Another libertine, who is to be one of the guests, Hector Moulcon (Mr. A Wigan), writes a letter to Ernest, telling him "that as soon as he has put the old mummy to bed"—wrapped him up in cotton, and stuffed his ears with it—their revelries can commence. This letter, from the similarity of names, falls into Stanislaus' hands: he immediately vows vengeance against Moulcon, and determines to join the party, much to his nephew's dissatisfaction, who dares not, however, show it. The guests arrive, comprising Madame de St. Luc (Mrs. Seymour), a widow to whom Moulcon is paying his addresses; the Baronese Cobrson (Mrs. Stanley), Lusicol (Mr. Rogers), and Leonie (Miss Reynolds), who is brought under the chaperonage of Mdlle. Susanne Ornant de Villedieu, a ci-devant premiere danseuse (Mrs. Keeley). The old gentleman, who has got himself up with great effect for the occasion, in an instant creates a very favourable impression in his favour by the graceful manner in which he complimente the ladies, and even contrives to take the beauty of the party, Leonie, into dinner. The announcement of the meal cuts short an interesting anecdote which Stanislaus is telling to the company—how several years ago he had quarrelled with a gentleman coming out of the opera, and killed him in a duel. They go into the salle-à-manger, and, still re-collecting the trembling letter, the "roused lion," Stanislaus, begins to shine at the expense of Monsieur. He rants him out in love-making with the widow; he dances the gavotte with Suzanne (Mrs. Keeley), in a manner which entirely throws into the shade the other's waltz; he out-drinks him; he wins his money at cards; and lastly, fences with him for ten louis the hit, and wins an additional fifty. Meanwhile, Leonce is importuned more than is agreeable by Ernest and Gustave, and she throws herself upon Stanislaus for protection. He sends her to his apartment, and then he and his guest do honour. Hector learns that Leonce is in the old gentleman's room, and resolves upon, as he considers, exposing him to the ridicule of the company. Leonce has an interview with Stanislaus, in which she tells him that she came to the dinner expecting it was his house; for that her mother, on her death-bed, had told her to seek the possessor of the name of Fondanche out whenever she heard it, and trust in him as a father. She shows him a locket, by the aid of which he sees that she is the daughter of the man whom he had killed in the duel at the opera years ago. He promises to befriend her, she falls on his neck, and at this moment Moulon opens the door and discovers them. But he is only made game of himself; for Stanislaus finishes the anecdote which dinner had interrupted, and tells Leonce that she is all he his sole heiress. He then discloses the fact that Moulon is a married man, upon which the widow discards him; and Leonce gives her hand to Ernest her old lover through the lorgnette—which makes the "roused lion," Stanislaus, perfectly happy.

The chief parts of the drama were Stanislaus and Suzanne. As the old beau of the empire, Mr. Webster played admirably. As soon as he has got over the hesitation which characterises his first night's performances, it will be one of his best characters: perhaps, his very best. His fencing, his dancing, and his gallantry of the old school, were carefully studied, and admirably carried out. Of Mrs. Keeley's ci-devant pretty-dear, it is impossible to speak too highly. Every word—every action had its meaning. The delicious coquetry with which she displayed her foot, when the old gentleman was talking to her; her airy dress, so clever a compromise between the origin and the guest; her delight at again dancing the gavotte, and discovering in Stanislaus an old sweetheart; and the punctilio with whom she insisted upon being called "Madamoiselle," drew down thunders of applause. No living actress could have made what Mrs. Keeley did of the character. Mr. Wigan, as the scamp Moulon, dressed and acted to perfection. It was what actors call "an up-hill part," but he played it capitally. Miss Reynolds gave the pathetic portions of Leonce her best to speak, very nicely; and Mr. H. Vandenhoff's ineffective nonchalance only made us regret that he was playing at all.

The applause was most enthusiastic at the fall of the curtain; and Mr. Webster and Mrs. Keeley were called before it. The gentleman subsequently announced "The Roused Lion" for representation every evening until further notice. It will, however, bear considerable curtailment. The piece was very heavy; and the pathos at the end somewhat lagged. It is the adaptation of a French piece, "Le Réveil du Lion," now performing in Paris.

On Thursday evening the new comedy by Mr. Sullivan, called "Family Pride," was brought out, and with success; if its reception by the house can be taken as a proof. But we have seen so many instances of late, of plays which created a perfect furore on their first representation, being heard of no more after a few performances, that we put but little faith in these demonstrations. We do not think this new piece calculated to sustain the reputation which Mr. Sullivan has acquired by what he has previously written. It is certainly inferior to the "Beggar on Horseback," both in construction and conception; and with the exception of the characters played by Mr. Farren and his son, the parts were so ineffective that we do not wonder at the refusal of Mr. Keeley, Mr. Wigan, and Miss Julia Bennett to play those enacted by Messrs. Clarke, Hudson, and Miss Reynolds.

Yet the comedy was by no means deficient in literary merit. In the first three acts several admirable passages and epigrammatic replies were readily seized on by the audience, and heartily applauded. After this, the interest and the writing fell off alike; and, more than once, in the fifth act, some very audible hissing came from the pit.

Paucity of incident was the great fault of the comedy; all the business of the five acts could have been put conveniently into two. The action opened well, and worked up capitally to the middle, when it became meagre, unreal, and no sympathy was excited concerning the fortunes of any of the characters.

The plot—of remarkable tenuity—turns on the love entertained mutually between Arthur Courtney (Mr. H. Farren), the descendant of two ancient family, and Sophi Clapman (Mrs. Nisbett), the daughter o. a wool-merchant (Mr. Tilbury). Arthur is a fine spirited fellow, and does not altogether fall in with his mother's, Mrs. Willoughby Courtney (Mrs. W. Clifford) notion of family pride, albeit he is at times affected with them, in spite of the guidance of his honest-hearted tutor, Dr. Dodge (Mr. Farren.) Mrs. Courtney, suspecting her son's attachment, tells Sophia she is decidedly an unequal marriage, thinks meanly of the girl what she may expect if she encourages his addresses. The consequence of this is, that, when he proposes, she refuses him—also a terrible blow to the Courtney pride. In pique, Arthur transfers his attentions to her cousin, Letitia Bradley (Miss Reynolds.) From this point the story advances but little, until, after a series of troubles and mortifications which affect all parties alike, Mrs. Courtney sees the folly of her pride. She finds her acquaintances give Dr. Dodge notice to quit; and finds, to her misery, that her son determines on going with his tutor. Explanations at last take place. The young couple are made happy; Letitia, also, gives her hand to Captain Stangeyeak (Mr. Hudson); and Mrs. Courtney—somewhat inconsistently hints at her own alliance with Dr. Dodge. An underplot amongst the servants was sustained by Grace (Mrs. Humby); Blanchet (Mr. Brindal); and Straddle (Mr. Clark.)

All the actors exerted themselves; and we must make especial mention of Mr. H. Farren, who very agreeably surprised us by his spirited performance of Young Courtney. It is decidedly the best thing that he has yet done, and he fully deserved the applause he met with. Mr. Farren had a part which suited him admirably; and gave his history, in the last act, to Mrs. Courtney, with all his inimitable archness and point. And Mrs. Nisbett had so much that was nice to say, and said it so prettily, that her appearance on the stage was always the signal, as usual, for the liveliest expression of satisfaction amongst the audience. Mrs. W. Clifford was perfect as Mrs. Courtney.

The play was well mounted, and the scenery, consisting entirely of old interiors, excellently painted. All the principal performers were called for at the end of the play, and so was the author, but he did not appear. Mr. Farren announced it for repetition every evening.

We hope that Mr. Sullivan will, in his next comedy, pay greater attention to the construction of his plot. His talents are of no ordinary character; and he may, with a little care, take a high place, perhaps the highest, amongst the comedy writers of the present day. His style is fresh and vivid; and he has an agreeable method of depicting the manners of existing good society, by no means common amongst our dramatists.

ADELPHI.

Some interest was attached to the drama of "Gabrielli, or the Bequeathed Heart," produced here on Thursday evening, from the circumstance of its having been the last piece written by the late Mr. H. B. Peake; and Mr. Webster, in bringing it out, was chiefly actuated by a desire to keep the lamented gentleman's name before the public, whilst the subscription is open for the benefit of his family. We are happy to be able to record the complete success of the drama, which is likely to do good service to the lucky Adelphi.

It is in two acts, and the first passes in Italy, where a young Irish gentleman on his travels, Fitzgerald O'Carrol (Mr. Boyce), is spending the carnival-tide. He gives a grand entertainment to the revellers, at which the celebrated Fanny Cerito, the prima donna of the opera, appears as Diana. With her he falls desperately in love. Gabrielli, as the queen of the fête, asks all her admirers to bequeath her something in token of their love. Fitzgerald asks her heart. He believes this to be an avowal of her affection for him; and insists that his will shall be immediately drawn up by Valdarno (Mr. G. Smith), a Milanese lawyer. Upon this the Italian suggestion of Gabrielli is attached to the bequest—that, if Fitzgerald's relatives offer any opposition to it, the penalty of £10,000 shall be chargeable on the Irish estates. A splendid pic-nic is then given, to which a Bronze Statue of Charlemagne (Mr. Chambers) is invited. He quarrels with Fitzgerald; a duel ensues, and the latter is killed. Gabrielli arrives in time to receive his last injunction that his body may be taken to Ireland. With this situation the first act concludes. Twelve months then pass; and we next find Fitzgerald's family, in Ireland, dismayed at the demand of Valdarno, in the name of Gabrielli, for the heart, or the penalty attached to its refusal. He offers to forego it, on receiving the hand of Henrietta (Miss Vincent), O'Carrol's sister. This is indignantly refused by her mother (Mrs. Yates). The officers of the law then enforce the condition. They seize the property, eject the tenants servants, and, finally, the family of O'Carrol itself. Gabrielli, who had retired to a religious house, unexpectedly appears, exposes Valdarno's villany, restores the estates to the O'Carrols, and thus the piece concludes. There was an excellent bit of Irish character in O'Carrol's steward, Mr. Wigan, as Giacomelli, an Italian servant; and Mr. Paul Bedford, as a corpulent Italian, the Marquis de Stanco. All the characters were very slight, but were willingly undertaken by the principals to aid the debut of Miss Cerito; and all played admirably. The piece has been beautifully put upon the stage, the Carnival scenes being very splendid and effective. The house was literally crammed.

"La Sonnambula" has been, as usual, a great hit at the SURREY, and has attracted crowds on each night of its representation during the week. The "Maid of Artois" will be revived, for Mr. H. Phillips; and the "Bondman" will also be played for the benefit on this day of the week.

The Sacred Harmonic Society commenced its series of concerts on Wednesday night with the late lamented Dr. Mendelssohn's Oratorio "Elijah" As an especial mark of respect for the illustrious dead, the concert was opened with Handel's "Dead March in Saul."

THE POLISH BALL.

The Polish Ball, at Guildhall, on Wednesday evening, was one of the most brilliant réunions yet held for the charity, upwards of 1600 persons being present, including a great number of the aristocracy. All the beautiful decorations put up for Lord Mayor's Day were retained; and the coup d'œil, when all the company had arrived, was most superb. Besides Adams's band, in the Hall, there was a small but excellent orchestra, in the Council-chamber, for polkas and waltzes; and some of the company were even dancing in the broad passages leading thereto.

The serving of the refreshments was very well and liberally arranged, and everything was of excellent quality. The dancing was kept up with unflagging spirit until very late; indeed when we left at five in the morning, after a most agreeable entertainment, fresh sets of quadrilles were forming, over and above the list on the programme, by the indefatigable guests. The concert gave, also, the greatest satisfaction.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

"A. Z. B. T." - See the Notices to Correspondents in our last number. We have examined the Problem subsequently received, and find you have overlooked an easy way of effecting Mate in 2 moves instead of 8.

"S. H. W."—It shall be duly looked into. Thanks for the improvement in your characters; they require but little more alteration to be perfectly legible. Why not, on all cases, adopt Capital letters, as well as in those where you describe the King?

"White King."— We reply to all communications which reach us. Your former letter may have miscarried. In the position sent, the veriest tyro ought to know that the King cannot take the Bishop.

"G. F. K."—If your adversary touches one of your pieces accidentally, to prevent dispute he should say, "Pardonnez," or, "I adjust," or words to that purport. You cannot then force him to take the man. By taking a piece, lift it clearly from the board, placing your own in its stead.

"Ambidexter."—They shall have attention. But we fear you compose too hastily to furnish us with anything worthy publication. Pray remember that a good Problem is a work of much time and reflection.

"Dingaling."—Dingaling 223 cannot be solved in two moves, as a moment's thought must have shown you.

"G. S. S.," Liverpool.—A very welcome packet of Games. Many thanks.

"A. Germain."—We are happy to say there is every prospect of your wishes being realised. By a communication just received, relating to your distinguished countryman, Von H. der Laca, now at Stockholm, we learn that it is his intention to spend a short time at Hamburg, in the Spring, for the purpose of meeting Mr. Staunton, who has promised to visit Germany at that period.

"C. B. H."—You have taken our notice to "A. Z. B. T." too literally. His "game" was deserving all the praise we gave it; but the only play is admitted was that of the knight's end.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

I sat down, after long experience, what I thought pertinent to this business.—BACON.

ENERGY of purpose may be called the alchymy of life: according to Wordsworth, it is one of the moralities. "At the risk of giving a shock to the prejudices of artificial society," he says, "I have never been ready to pay homage to the aristocracy of nature, under a conviction that rigorous human-heartedness is the constituent principle of good taste." More of the good and evil of life is attributable to natural causes than we are in the habit of assigning to them. A purpose, well begun, has already made profitable progress. It is, therefore, most important that we set about what is taken in hand, vigorously—not as regards moral energy only, but with animal powers, which all concur as fitting auxiliaries of the spirit. To this end, the possession of health is an indispensable requisite: both mind and body should be hale and sound—"ut mens sana in corpore sano." How much character and cheerful success are the true agents to train mankind for the battle of life. These are better represented by our National Sports than by any other means that popular philosophy has yet applied to an end, whose social consequences are of such high concern. The sports of flood and field are games sacred to Hygeia, in their use—but not in their abuse—and thus we have always dealt with them. A summer sail upon the Solent, or a winter "burst" with the Badsworth, are worth all the whole pharmacopœia as specifics for a light heart and a clear head—but it does not result that a taste for yachting should send a man to cruise off Cape Horn; neither, that being fond of a run with foxhounds, he should follow hazard for his living also. No one that has breasted the dawn in a gallop across Newmarket Heath during one of the Spring or Autumn Meetings, and gone home to breakfast with his spirits as boon as the blue ether, need bring with that the turf into the counting-house to be despised: but the same individual would tell you a different story, after being done in the ring as brown as chocolate. . . . . .

We have stumbled upon the didactic—because it was thrown in our way by events of temporary occurrence. The policy of horse-racing has latterly been somewhat roughly mooted by certain morality-mongers—a class that never allow an opportunity for saying their say, however ill-timed or inconsiderate being taken advantage of. They denounced it for the sake of those disorderlies who, at the close of the season, misled their memoranda of obligations, and overlooked the payment of their creditors. The first consequence of the alchymy of life, neglect on the tree supplied those who wrought with a wholesome exercise. The manly pastimes of this country all tend to useful ends. "Better to hunt in fields for health unbought," than go to the apothecary's shop for it, and return with a spurious article. The season, which of itself led us abroad to delight the senses, while it braced the system, has passed away; and the dreary month of November has come to its stead. To be sure it has been more liberal of sunshine and fair weather than many a May we can remember; nevertheless, we want a stimulus to stir out, when the fog is as thick as pea-soup, or it will be anon. Then, an ye would keep at its average the energy which is the alchymy of life, neglect not the boon business of the field course, shoot, hunt, even fish, in face of Jack Frost, rather than surrender your manhood to the fireside. . . . . Such is the counsel of one who has tried both experiments. . . . . I set down after long experience what I thought pertinent to this business."

DRAINING.—Sir Robert Peel has a considerable number of labourers employed in draining his lands in Oswaldtwisle, near Blackburn, under the scientific direction of Mr. Parks. The drains are deep, and the materials employed are pipe tiles, which are manufactured by the same gentleman, and appear to be of excellent workmanship. It is said that Sir Robert Peel charges his tenants a very easy per centage, by way of additional rent, on the cost of the outlay—viz., 4½ per centum. It is greatly to be regretted that this example were generally followed. There is scarcely a field in the hundred of Blackburn that does not require draining.

SINGULAR SUICIDE AT SEA.—The master of the ship Confidence, just arrived at Cork, has communicated an account of an extraordinary and determined act of self-destruction, which occurred on board that vessel while on her voyage from Bilbao. The unhappy individual was a captain similarly forged notes at Devizes, but have not yet been apprehended. The police are said to be in possession of a clue to the engraver of the plates of these forgeries.

TURNING AT CONNAUGHT TOGETHER.—Considerable disturbance took place recently at Consdie Ironworks, near Shotley-bridge, in the county of Durham, in consequence of some dispute between the Irish and the English labourers employed there. There had been previously a quarrel between the parties, and some skirmishing, in which the Englishmen were victors; and on Sunday last the Irish mustered strong, with the intention of revenging their past injuries. The tumult at one time rose to a great height, stones were thrown, and in one case a knife was drawn, but happily the manager of the works, with great firmness and energy, interfered, and expostulated with the men on the impropriety of their conduct, with such good effect, that order was eventually restored, but not until severe injuries had been inflicted on both sides. Several of the ringleaders being known, were subsequently taken into custody, and after undergoing examinations before the Magistrates, were committed for various terms of imprisonment.

COUNTRY NEWS.

New Branch Bank of England, Bristol. (From a Correspondent.)—This building was opened to the public on Monday last. The former establishment, which was at the top of Bridge-street, was inconveniently small and badly situated, on account of its distance from the business part of the City and the Exchange; and, consequently, the present building, which adjoins the Guildhall, in Broad-street, was determined on. The present situation is not the most eligible that could have been chosen, but is, though, a great improvement on the old place. The building, which is of massive stone-work throughout, except the vaults and roof of the banking-saloon, is after the design of Mr. C. R. Cockerell, Professor of Architecture in the Royal Academy, London. The contractors were Messrs. Wilcox and Sons, of Bristol. The building cost, with the site, upwards of £20,000.

Alexander Robertson, Esq., was voted to the chair. Some discussion ensued, and a resolution was passed requesting the Directors to apply for an enlargement of time, and to reduce the expenditure; and, in the event of the non-compliance of the Board, to wind up the affairs, and dissolve the Company.

It had been brought there to be used in the blasting of the Morley Railway tunnel. Sacrilege in Gloucester Cathedral.—A robbery has lately been committed in Gloucester Cathedral by thieves, who forced an entrance through one of the windows, and broke open an alms box kept in the sacred edifice for receiving contributions to the Gloucester Infirmary. P." stamped on it, a gimlet, a stock, and two centre-bits. The tools are now in the hands of the police. At the foot of the window whence the thieves made their escape, some 15s. or 16s. in silver were found. THE STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

The following harrowing details of assassination give a frightful picture of the social condition of the country

On Friday evening se'nnight, at the early hour of seven o'clock, two armed men, whose faces were blackened, to avoid recognition, entered the house of John Ryan, steward and bailiff to Sir Matthew Barrington, Bart., within a quarter of a mile of the village of Murroe, and in the neighbourhood of a police station. They cried out, when within the door, 'Head-boy,' and swore they would have the life of Ryan, at whom they immediately presented. He caught hold of a friend of the name of Tucker, who was present to be in his house, and used him between the two armed men and himself. A short struggle ensued; and, when they had forcibly disengaged Tucker from Ryan, the latter grasped a chair to defend himself; and the faithful wife, throwing herself between her husband her husband's life from the deadly weapon, received the contents of a gun shot close under her left breast, which passed out through her back, and killed the poor woman on the spot. The dreaded husband then rushed to an adjoining room, where a gun was kept for his protection, and when he came out, found the murderers had disappeared, and the only object before him was the bleeding corpse of his murdered wife. The coroner's inquest on the body returned a verdict of 'Wilful murder' returned against some person or persons unknown."

A private letter, dated Nenagh, Saturday night, says, that Mr. Richard U. Bayly, most unfortunately, agent, chairman of the guardians of this union, and shot at on that evening, as he was proceeding from Nenagh to his residence at Ballinclough. Mr. Heard's head was grazed with a ball.

Mr. William Hassard, the treasurer of the county of Fermanagh, who was fired at by some unknown assassins on Saturday evening in his own lawn, expired of his injuries at an early hour on Monday morning. No less than 30 slugs were found in the thigh of the ill-fated gentleman, some of which, it is presumed, must have entered the groin, inflicting a mortal wound in some more vital part of the body. Mr. Hassard was an ultra-Liberal in politics, and is said to have been a humane and indulgent landlord.

The East Coast Fisheries.—Heavy fish trains reach the Bricklayers' Arms station of the South Eastern Railway, almost every morning, at an hour suited for delivery in Billingsgate market. During the last week, trains of nearly 30 trucks of fish have been thus received. We believe this great increase is partly to be attributed to the increased energy of the fishermen, consequent on the facilities and advantages they derive from railway communication.

THE PROFESSOR'S LADY.

BY BERTHOLD AUERBACH.

Without giving any answer, as he had thought of, Reinhard left the kitchen. he went not into the parlour, however, but with inaudible steps stole towards the arbour. Without the girl being able to see him, he stood and watched her for some time: he was struck by the first glance. He saw before him a countenance beaming with the calm expression of peace; a sweet repose was diffused over the rounded cheek: no passion had disturbed these features, nor had their beauty been marred by wild suffering or repentance; those refined lips could not speak a violent or a coarse word; an equable, delicate rose-tint seemed to be diffused over her cheeks, brow, and chin; and, as she now, with downcast eyes, held a flat iron quietly upon the frill she had been plaiting, it was like the image of a sleeping child. When she lifted up the frill and raised her eyes, Reinhard involuntarily stepped forward.

"Good morning, or rather noon," said Lorle, nodding.

"Thank you kindly for being again in a good humour."

"I was not angry," said she; "I know no reason for being so. Have you slept well?"

"Not perfectly well."

"Why not? Have you had any dreams? Don't you know that whatever people dream the first night in a strange bed comes true?"

"But not my dream."

"Indeed! What was it then? Would you tell me?"

"Willingly, and especially you. I dreamt of you."

"Ah! of me. That is not possible. Now, understand; don't think to make a fool of me; it would annoy me if you called me names, Grayling, but I would rather that you called me so, than that you should play off any of your tricks on me."

"But I may have had a dream which is not a folly. But do not look angry; there is nothing bad in it; it is only shy. I dreamt that I was sitting with you in the Bernese wagon, and your horse was harnessed to it, and had a great big bell fastened to its neck, which sounded like a church bell; and in this way the horse went flying through the air, and no sound of wheels was heard, and still we went on, and ever on. I wanted to hold the horse in, but it seemed as if it would pull my arm out of my body, and you sate beside me as calm as could be, and we went on and on; all of a sudden, however, the wagon turned over quite softly, and we were both together on the ground; and just then my companion came and woke me."

"That is a wonderful dream; but, in the next four weeks I will not drive out with you. What I would say, however, is, that your companion is a wonderfully queer fellow; my father says he is proud and haughty, but I think that he is conceited and awkward."

"But you have forgiven him disturbing you?" said Reinhard.

"Yes," said she; "and were you dressed at that time?"

"Not quite. You are right, however, about my companion: he is not proud; on the contrary, he is shy and timid."

"Yes, I thought so," returned she, "and precisely because he is bashful and timid, does he seem to attack people so and talk them quite dumb. Not long ago, when I was down with Yroni at the valley mill -you remember her, she is engaged to our Stephen they will be married in the autumn, and go to live at the mill. You'll be here, won't you, at the wedding?"

"That may be, but what were you going to tell me?" asked Reinhard.

"Yes, it is right that you keep people to their word, or I shall go on chattering all day. Well, I stopped at the mill till it was evening; they wanted to send somebody with me, to bear me company; I, however, would not let them do so, and yet I should have liked it: so I set out by myself all alone, and, when I got into the wood, I was frightened out of my wits; and, because I was so frightened, I began to whistle quite loud, as if all the world mattered nothing at all to me. But, what is all this about—I was going to tell you something—was not I?" continued Lorle, with her lips compressed, and her eyes fixed

"We were speaking of my companion," said Reinhard; "and"—

"Yes; that reminds me; he wilderies also so smartly, because he is full of fear is it not so."

"Very good! But you must be very kind to him; he is a right good fellow, who deserves it, and it would make him very happy."

"Well, I'll do what I can," said Lorle. "Is he a single man?"

"He is yet to be had, if he please you," remarked Reinhard.

"If you say that again," interrupted Lorle, lifting up the iron, "I'll burn your beard off. And, lest I should forget it, let me tell you, not to let them put you out of conceit with your beard; it is very becoming to you."

"I'll remember you, the whole world shall not shave it off."

"What please?" Who is talking about pleasing?" exclaimed a strong voice; it was Barbel.

Lorle is paying tribute to my companion," said Reinhard.

"Don't believe him; he is a mocking-bird," exclaimed the girl, and Barbel laughed.

"Go in, and drink your coffee, Mr. Reinhard; I shall not warm it for you again."

"Is that troll to go to church?" asked he, turning to Lorle.

"Yes," replied she; "it belongs to Barbel, and she is going; I shall stop at home. You are going, too, are you not?"

"Yes," said Reinhard, and went into the room. He had, in reality, not intended to go to church; but now he must and would; he must because he had said so, and he would because Lorle was remaining at home alone. We all of us feel, even in the most trifling actions a general character, so he persuaded himself that, through the interest which would be created by his going to church, he should lay again a foundation for his participation in village life, and have a right to it also.

Whilst Reinhard was thinking this over in the parlour, Lorle said to Barbel, in the arbour, "Only think, Barbel, he dreamed of me last night."

"What," asked Barbel, "about me?"

"Oh, Mr. Reinhard." Lorle was very particular in always adding the word Mr. to people's names when she spoke of them even when they were absent.

"Don't you be thinking about the Fox-beard," returned Barbel.

"The beard is not at all foxy," said Lorle, full of anger; "it is of a very beautiful chesnut-brown, and Mr. Reinhard is just as warm-hearted as ever he was, and you ought to be always grateful to him, for when he was out here, and it is not right of you to say so much against him. And, even if he had that joke with the crier, he is not proud, and he talks so familiarly and kindly—"

"All I can say," interrupted Barbel, "is, do you take care of yourself; you are no longer a child."

"Yes, I mean that too; I know also how one is, I"——

"Give me my frill, you are making a mess of it again," said Barbel, and went away

Reinhard went, dressed in his Sunday apparel, with Stephen and Martin, to the church; everybody nodded kindly to him: many people looked, however, at his curious style of beard; still, he who wore it was at home with them; they had a feeling within their minds that he belonged to them, going with them, as he did, to the same temple, and to the same communion-table. On their way, Martin inquired, "Well, and what do you say to our Lorle? She is a girl—is not she?"

"She is," replied Reinhard, "Lorle is just like a lovely golden canary-bird among sparrows."

"He is a queer chap," said Martin, laughing, to Stephen; "but he is right."

Reinhard sate down in the side-gallery near the organ; the pealing sound of the organ did him a deal of good; it thrilled through his whole frame like a fresh stream; and Barbel, who from below looked up and saw him, thought to herself, "He is a good fellow, however. What an expression of devotion beams in his eyes!"

Reinhard only heard the beginning of the sermon. The text was "Cast your bread on the waters;" and on these words was preached a thundering sermon of condemnation, because the whole village had determined not to contribute anything to the Convent of the Sisters of Mercy which was being erected. Reinhard lost himself in all sorts of dreams during the monotonous, and, by fits and starts, tempestuous sermon. Below him, however, Barbel had dropped upon her knees, and, with her strong hands pressed vehemently together, prayed for Lorle; she could not get rid of the idea that danger threatened the dear girl, and she prayed fervently and ever more fervently. At length she arose, and, making with her hand the sign of the cross over her face, all marks of anxiety passed away from it.

The peal of the organ again awoke Reinhard, and he left the church with the communny. Not far from the church-door, Barbel stood waiting, and while she gave them their hymn book quickly to her brother, she said to Reinhard, "Good day to you!" He felt hurt, he did not know why, that she now greeted him for the first time.

Reinhard had not got far from the church when he met the Sub-Librarian with a butterfly impaled upon his hat-brim.

"What have you got there?" asked Reinhard.

"A magnificent specimen of the Papilio machaon, or the swallow-tailed butterfly. I had a deal of trouble to catch it, but I was resolved to have it, because our Head-librarian has not such a one in his private collection. There were two of them; they were sporting in the air with one another, flattering towards one another, and then away again. They are happy little creatures, the butterflies! I would gladly either have had them both or have left them together; but I could only catch one; and look, what a flurry I am! for just at the moment I caught it I stepped into a bog."

"And do you always carry pins with you?" asked Reinhard.

"Always. Look, here is my arsenal," and with that he opened the breast of his coat, and there was the letter R normed by the heads of pins. "But that I may not forget it," continued he, "I found that word."

"What word?" asked Reinhard

"The epithet for that gir. Blustful! It is a great advantage in our language that this word is both transitive and intransitive. She is ful of bliss herself, and she imbues bliss into the sous of others. But stop; while I am speaking I have found the original word —it is Madonna-like. Whatever the human heart acknowledges of blissful and adorable is comprised in the word Madonna. No other language can furnish such a somes proprium in the adjective form. Madonnalike, that is it!"

Reinhard was silent, and it was not till after some time that he inquired if his friend had been the whole time in the wood

"Oh, certainly; it was heavenly! I have inhaled a deep draught of sylvan solitude. Hitherto, when I have gone into the woods, it has been always to me but as if it was shutting up its secrets from my knowledge, as if I were not worthy to walk among these sacred rows of pillars, and to perceive the still quire of eternal nature. It seemed always to me that, the moment I stepped out of the wood, the sweet mysterious whisper began behind me, and incomprehensible melodies resounded. To-day, however, I have compelled the wood. I have urged forward, through brambles and over rocks, to the head of the brook, where it rushes forth from between huge blocks of basalt, and forms for itself immediately a broad round basin, as if it would there remain at home. You cannot have been there, else you would have painted it. That must be your first picture. The trees hang down as if they would conceal the sanctuary from every mortal eye; and in every leaf reposes peace. The red and waute fox-glove springs out of every chink; it is a poisonous plant, but it is wonderfully beautiful! The soft ersca conceals itself, listening behind the rocks, and ventures not forth into the bustle around. There I spent an hour, and have lived through an immensity. It is a spot where one can lose oneself in everything. The bells resounded from here and there, and it was to me like the humming of bees, which now, in the certainty of fine weather, had ventured a long way from home. In coming away, I climbed up to the top of the hill which towers far above the church steeple, and stood, as it were, above Zion, in the strength of the immortal spirit. I felt then as I had never done before; that I can never die—that I am immortal! I took hold on the earth, which shall one day cover me, and my spirit floated high above all worlds. I may go joylessly through life—I may rest in a nameless grave—but I have lived from eternity—I am immortal"

Reinhard seated himself upon a bank by the road side, and, pulling his friend to sit beside him, he said, "Go on." His friend looked at him with an anxious expression, and thus continued—

"I lay thus for a long time in a blessed but sorrowful rapture; I gazed at the ever-flowing fountain. Transparent as air, it leaps forth from hidden darkness, and then, pure and bright, winds its way down the glen; but, before it reaches the tranquil woodland path, it is made prisoner; and what does it do then? It leaps boldly over the mill-wheel, and hastens to the flowers on the shore. In the town, however, it is no longer free; there it becomes impure and discoloured; it knows itself no longer. Thus may it be also with a pure and bright child of Nature. What then is to be done? Flow on thou stream sprung from the rock; flow on to the unfathomable and unconstrained ocean; there again is new existence; there is eternal clearness and eternal life, quietness, and movement within itself. At first I never imagined that I should retain what I thought; now, however, I should like it all put into melodious verse, and I bothered myself so with all sorts of metre, that all my quiet was gone. I then bethought myself of you. But what does it matter? I have lived, and nothing more is needed!"

"I have known your sylvan sanctuary a long time," said Reinhard, on their homeward way. "I have often dreamed there myself, but I never could represent it by my pencil. Let your thoughts paint it, then it will be another thing. I have kept myself apart from landscape: and yet, whenever I come here, it seems to me that here some deep revelation awaits me, especially now: perhaps it is your wood-sanctuary—perhaps not."

"Where have you been during my woodland ramble?" inquired the Sub-Librarian.

"I was in church; you ought, properly, to have been there; it belongs to peasant-life."

"Yes, yes, you are right; ay, ay, I'm sorry; however, I'll go this afternoon."

There was a great changing of dress when they got to the public-house; and when the Sub-Librarian came down with clean shoes on, Lorle said to him kindly, "It is beautiful, Mr. Sup-Librarian, that you don't let people wait of you. Where have you been?"

"Up in the wood," returned he. "But do not call me Sup-Librarian; my proper name is Adalbert Reihenmaier"

"That is a deal prettier," said Lorle; "now tell me some news, Mr. Reihenmaier"

"I have not much to tell."

"Then we will wait till afternoon," said Lorle. "You will go with us, too, to the valley mill, and you can sing so beautifully."

"I will go anywhere, especially where you are. I was thinking about you, also, in the wood," said he.

"You must not play off your jokes on me: I am too good for that, and so are you," said she; "it does not become such a gentleman as you. Be well-mannered; that is right. But you must put on a Sunday coat, also. Have you not one?"

"More than one, but not here," said he.

"Yes; but then you know that you were to spend a Sunday with us. Well, never mind it. I'll send Martin to you, and he shall brush you a little."

The Sub-Librarian sprang excitedly up the stairs, and, taking a collection of popular songs out of his knapsack, he threw it up to the ceiling, and again caught it. "Here," said he, fondling the book as if it were some living thing, "here you are at home, not penned up in the library. To-day you shall be again alive."

The old custom no longer prevailed at dinner: a table was laid for Reinhard and his friend in the little private room. Reinhard told the Landlord that they would eat at the family table, as he had done formerly. The old man, however, only shook his head, without making any reply; and, taking off his skull-cap, and holding it between his folded hands upon his breast, commenced asking a blessing

"Bärbel, carry out the two covers; we shall not eat by ourselves," exclaimed Reinhard.

The Landlord quickly put on his cap again, looked right and left without changing a feature, and said, "Only be quiet." After that, he made a tolerably long pause, as he always did when he said these words, which served as an admonition for no one to grumble till he proceeded. "Let things be as they are in there," at length he said, "there is no room here for two;" and with that he waved his hand through the air, as much as to say that it was settled.

The strangers seated themselves in the inner room. Lorle waited on them.

"Cannot Bärbel do that?" asked Reinhard; and the Sub-Librarian added, "You shall not wait upon us."

"Oh, good heavens, what a fuss you make about my waiting on you. I do it very willingly; and some time, when you have a dear wife of your own, Mr. Reihenmaier, and I come to see you, and you are so good as to give me something to eat, then your wife shall wait on me."

"But how do you know that I shall be married?"

"That one can see plainly written on your forehead," said Lorle; "and I fancy that a wife with you would be downright happy."

"And how can you tell that?" asked he

"Because you are so neat with your napkin."

Everybody laughed: and her father, who sate at table in the other room, said, "She's a sharp lass, and she has not chattered as much in a whole year as she has done since last evening."

"Yes," said the mother, after she had swallowed a spoonful of soup with great satisfaction, and now rapping her husband's spoon with her own, "you will sometime see what sort of a girl that is who is as clever as the day."

"She has got that from you, and from the first horse of our team, Bärbel," interrupted the Host, returning the blow with the spoon.

FLYING SHEETS FROM OUR TRAVELLING CONTRIBUTOR.

MUNICH, NOV. 12.

I SEND you herewith a drawing of the "Bavaria," a statue which, when finally completed, and erected on the grand site chosen for it on the Theresienwiese, in the neighbourhood of Munich, will, for its colossal proportions, its beauty of design, and the felicity of its execution, be without a parallel in the world.

I have already had occasion, more than once, to speak of the grandeur which characterises the ideas of the present King of Bavaria. I have spoken of the decorations of his capital, which have been seen and appreciated by so many of the travelling world. To him also belongs the credit of having originated the idea of the Zollverein, generally attributed to the King of Prussia. It was when he was still Crown Prince that King Louis first conceived the plan of that general protective union of the different States of Germany, which, as Englishmen, we must oppose; but which, judged of by Germans, and with a view to German interests, must be admitted to be at once national and wise, and, in reference to the whole of the great German race, patriotic.

The "Bavaria" is intended to embody a grand idea of Bavarian nationality. A long time ago, the King determined to erect a building for the purpose of receiving the statues of Bavarians who have merited such a distinction, or who may hereafter merit it. It is now rapidly approaching completion: it is to be called the "Ruhmeshalle." I send you a small sketch of it. In front of this building the "Bavaria" is to stand; the conception being, by thus embodying in the figure the attributes of the country, to incite the men of the present and of the future to render themselves worthy of a place among the heroes of the past. The Ruhmeshalle is situated on an elevation commanding the Theresenwiese, at a point from which the drawing you lately published of the race-course during the Volks-fest was taken.

The statue itself is of colossal proportions. The height from the feet to the top of the wreath held in the left hand is seventy feet. The pedestal is twenty-seven feet high; and the hill, on the summit of which it is placed, is thirty feet high. Thus, from the level of the plain from which it rises, the whole elevation attained by the statue is 127 feet. The lion seated by the side of the figure is twenty-seven feet high.

I regret extremely that the artist commissioned to make the design, after repeated attempts, has failed to render to my satisfaction, the singular softness and benignity which characterise the expression of the gigantic face. In this respect, as in the rest of the figures, the sculptor, Schwanthaler, has admirably carried out the idea of his Royal patron. The whole character of the figure is exquisitely feminine, yet there is, at the same time, a majesty—especially in the countenance—which I have never seen equalled in any work of modern sculpture. The attitude is that of encouragement; the wreath is formed of oak leaves and fruit, the oak being the national tree of Bavaria, as it is of England. The crown, composed of loosened fetters, is emblematic of the worthily-earned Independence of Bavarian citizens, and has reference to the movements in the direction of freedom which characterised the Bavarians in the middle ages. The right hand rests on a sword, sheathed, and placed in the girdle of the figure, which is intended to be emblematic of peace; and the wild, almost savage costume, recals the condition of the German people in the earliest ages of which we have record. The back of the figure is, at least, as beautiful as the front, and the magnificent tresses—which are so exquisitely modelled that the brass of which they are composed seems almost to wave in natural curls—represent the long hair so characteristic of the Germans in all ages

What adds to the interest, if not, strictly speaking, to the nationality of the figure, is that it is cast from cannon taken in the war of independence of the Greeks against the Turks.

To give some more tangible idea of the size of this figure, I may observe that, in the head and the upper part of the bust, five and twenty men have found room; in the central part of the figure, thirty-five or forty persons could dine; and the space of ground covered by the lower section is enormous in proportion. It is intended to construct, within the figure, from the base of the pedestal to the top of the head, a staircase; so that persons can mount to the summit, from which they will have a grand view of Munich, with the pretty river, the Isar, which runs by its side, clasping in its many arms the immediate suburbs, with, in the distance, the magnificent outline of the Tyrolean mountains. When the statue finally assumes its position (and the greater part is completed already) it would almost be worth a journey to Munich to see it, on one of those resplendent moonlight nights, which are there so beautiful, but, unfortunately, so rare. I should observe that the figure is cast in sections. The whole of the upper part, down to considerably below the waist, is completed, and stands in the court-yard of the Royal Foundry, where the casting takes place. It is visited daily by numbers of persons, especially foreigners, who are invariably earnest in their admiration of this gigantic beauty. The lower part of the figure, with the exception of the feet, is also finished, and I believe that the lion is now being cast. The foundry itself is also well worth seeing, everything being on so enormous a scale.

It is not for its enormous size, however, that I admire this figure. Any one with the requisite money and disposition to throw it away, can erect a giant of brass or stone. What is worthy of admiration is, first, the conception of setting up such an ideal of nationality among a people so much in want of sentiments of the kind; and, of this, the credit is wholly due to the King. Secondly, the execution, which combines so many excellences, and so admirably carries out the idea; and, for this, the praise is due to Schwanthaler. The reputation of that artist, however, stands upon a broader basis, and appeals to higher evidences; but, still, no man can look at the Bavaria without being filled with a deep respect for the intellectual character of the Monarch, and a corresponding admiration of the genius of the sculptor.

I have already expressed my regret that the limits of these communications prevent me giving a more detailed account of the various objects of interest in Munich. The other day, however, I stumbled quite accidentally on a relic which must have attraction for every lover of poetry. It is on a level, in point of interest, with the celebrated bedstead and furniture of Luther at Warsburg, or the chair of Rubens, at Antwerp. I speak of an original writing-table of Schiller, the history of which leads to the conviction that there he must have written some of his most remarkable works. It is to be seen in a sort of miscellaneous collection of curiosities, called the Verein-Sammlung, situated in what is called the Bazaar, in the Hofgarten, in Munich. The writing-table is composed of common deal. The inclined piece of wood, or desk, in the centre, was so constructed as to be capable of being raised up and down by a small windlass, so that the lid, which covers the whole, could be shut down and locked. On the left hand side of the desk, is a chess-board, stained or cut into the wood. Unless the visitors ask for this relic, it is probable that it would not be shown to them.

I perceive, by the French and Belgian papers, that the political movement made here in favour of increased freedom, more especially of the press, has attracted attention. For my own part, I agree to a certain extent with a distinguished writer in the leading French journal, that the importance of Bavaria in European politics is at present underrated. In the event of any great development of the German political mind, which would depend upon the state of affairs elsewhere, Bavaria might become an important counterpoise to Prussian and Austrian influence. But I doubt much whether these Bavarians are themselves conscious either of the natural advantages the position and character of their country gives them, or of what might be done by good statesmanship acting upon an united government and people. In the meanwhile, there does not seem to be the best possible understanding between the latter two Powers; and the Chambers have abstained from following up their last strong movement.

SCHWANTHALER'S COLOSSAL STATUE OF "BAVARIA," IN THE ROYAL FOUNDRY, AT MUNICH.

SCENE FROM "THE CAMP OF SILESIA," AT ASTLEY'S.—(THE PANDOURS' CAVERN.)

PLATE PRESENTED BY THE LINCOLNSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY TO THEIR SECRETARY.

THE Lincolnshire Agricultural Society, which was established some twenty-three or twenty-four years since, has lately been dissolved, though not until its example had been pretty extensively followed throughout Lincoln, "the first county in agriculture in the world"—by the establishment of similar associations.

The members of the parent Society have, however, signalised their retirement by a very graceful mark of esteem—the presentation of a magnificent Piece of Plate to their Secretary, Richard Carline, Esq., ex-Mayor of Lincoln. The Testimonial, costly as it is, has been deservedly bestowed; Mr. Carline having, for many years, managed the business of the Society without any remuneration, by generously giving up the usual bill of costs in order to augment the funds available for premiums.

PLATE PRESENTED TO THE SECRETARY OF THE LINCOLNSHIRE AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.

The Plate is a plateau, or central table ornament, of exquisite chasteness: it is from the works of Mr. Benjamin Smith, of Duke-street, Lincoln's Inn-fields. The design represents a halt in the Desert. Beneath the shade of three palm-trees, is an Arab on the back of a camel; an attendant is handing water in a cup to the rider, and the thirsty camel, snuffing the water, is eagerly looking up; by the side of the palm-tree is a well. The group presents some novelty in its execution; the lofty palm-trees being cut out of the solid silver. It was shown among the beautiful works exhibited last season at the Society of Arts, where it elicited marked approbation.

The Plate bears the following inscription:—

Presented by the Lincolnshire Agricultural Society to their esteemed friend Richard Carline, Esq., Mayor of the City of Lincoln, in estimation of their high sense of his long, gratuitous, and valuable services as Honorary Secretary—Oct. 6, 1847.

This superb Testimonial was presented to Mr. Carline at a sumptuous entertainment at the Saracen's Head Inn, Lincoln, on the 5th inst. There were about 70 guests: Charles Chaplin, Esq., in the chair, having the ex-Mayor and the Hon. A. L. Melville on his right hand, and Sir Charles John Anderson, Bart., and J. Fardell, Esq., on his left. Amongst the gentlemen present were, Mr. Thomas Greetham, Mr. J. G. Stephenson, Mr. W. H. Brooke, Mr. Cooke, Digby, Mr. Bartholomew, Mr. Popplewell, Mr. Fred. Straw, Mr. Capp, Mr. Clarke, and nearly all the leading agriculturists in the neighbourhood.

ASTLEY'S.

OUR Illustration shows the most picturesque scene in the new drama of "The Camp of Silesia," the production of which was noticed in our Journal of last week.

The Scene is the Cavern of the Pandours (or Gipsies), by a party of whom Frederick, King of Prussia, has been made prisoner; and his Majesty is seen chained to a pillar in the cavern, with the Pandours by their fires, grouped around the captive Monarch. In the rear are the horses of the band; and two or three cavaliers are seen entering the cavern, on their return from a nocturnal expedition.

This is altogether an artistical achievement, Rembrandtish in effect, to which the peculiar resources of the establishment—the horses—are valuable accessories. It is, indeed, a very spirited affair.

IMMIGRATION OF SOUTH SEA ISLANDERS INTO NEW SOUTH WALES.

AN exceedingly interesting experiment in colonisation has just been undertaken at Sydney, by Mr. Benjamin Boyd, of Church-hill, with the view of increasing the supply of labour in the Colony.

On the first of May last, an Act of the Imperial Parliament for regulating the Sale and Leasing Waste Lands became the law of the Colony. To meet the demand for labour which this new measure would create, no provision had, however, been made; and the last session of the Local Legislature had closed before the excellent plan of a Committee of the Council for a grand system of Free Immigration (simultaneously with a modified system of Exiles) could be established by the whole House. In short, the question which had been agitated for many months in the Colony—"How is Labour to be obtained?"—remained unanswered.

As some two years must elapse before any Government plan for the sufficient supply of European labour could be matured, Mr. Boyd foresaw that, whilst the grass was growing, his flocks and herds would be starving. He, accordingly, determined on importing his own labourers; and, with this view, he despatched a vessel for the South Sea Islands, the captain being instructed to call at many islands as possible, so that he might satisfy himself, not only as to the people most fitted for the wants of the Colonists, but also as to the number of labourers likely to be procured. In due time, the vessel returned, with sixty-five active young men, selected from Tanna, Kahamo, and Lefoo, islands of the Loyalties, a group very imperfectly laid down in the charts, and which lies between New Caledonia and the New Hebrides, distant about three weeks' sail from Sydney.

The ages of these men varied from 14 to 25; sixty-two of them have been sent to Mr. Boyd's stations, on the Murray; and the three whose portraits are annexed, were to accompany the Captain who had brought them from their island homes, on his next trip to the Coral Islands.

Etoni is a Chief, and brother to Zuela, the King of Lefoo. Panyella is his conjuror (an officer of much importance amongst the superstitious islanders); and Sabbathdoo is the conjuror's servant. They are highly intelligent men; their rapidity at calculation, by a system of decimals, is surprising, and their activity and capacity for effective service very satisfactory. In a periodical work, published at Sydney, Etoni is related to have dived beneath a wreck in the harbour there, and, in a very short time, to have swum back, and reported, in the most seamanlike manner, the condition of the ill-fated vessel.

It appears that Mr. Boyd's wish was that, in the first instance, only thirty of these Islanders should be engaged, but so eager were the people to be taken on board, that it was only through the authority of the Chiefs that the number could be limited; the explanation of this desire for removal being that the inhabitants of the Coral Islands are in a condition, during upwards of eight months of the year, little short of starvation.

With respect to the habits of the people, and their fitness for the occupations of civilised life, it is stated that, although cannibalism and infanticide prevail amongst them to a fearful extent, they manifest great tractability and intelligence in their domestic arrangements, hence it is considered that their vices may be attributed rather to the influence of the sufferings to which they are periodically exposed, than to any ineradicable peculiarity. The expense of introducing them is about £5 per man: Mr. Boyd's intention is to employ them as shepherds; but, they might easily be instructed for other services. The conduct of the party during the three weeks' voyage evinced great attachment to the master of the vessel; and the alacrity with which they endeavoured to obey any order he gave them, fully proved their inclination to work. Perhaps, the chief danger to be apprehended is the common one in all such cases, of the temptation of intoxicating drinks.

The master of the vessel states that from the various groups in the vicinity of New Holland, may be supplied an almost unlimited number of labourers. Indeed, we learn by the South Australian papers to the middle of June, that one 100-ton vessel of similar size to Mr. Boyd's might be obtained from different islands of Polynesia, by the steamer Juno, which Mr. Boyd was about to send.

The proposition is an important move in the great scheme of civilisation; and, if successful, must put to shame the inhumanities of conquest and extermination, which are too often glossed over as colonisation.

It is well observed in the Sydney periodical already quoted—"The accounts we have received of the miserable destitution of those poor islanders, and the horrible straits to which they are reduced, ought to be seriously considered by a Christian community, who are compelled to boil down their flocks and herds because they have not labour enough to tend them. We want Labour; these poor creatures want food; they are within a few weeks' sail from our shores; and it seems a dispensation of Divine Providence that the labour required by this vast Continent should be taken from the overpeopled islands with which the sea that washes our coast is studded. The emigration of these people will be the secret means of Christianising them; and if we would for ever abolish the dreadful crimes of infanticide and cannibalism from Polynesia, it is to be achieved by following up the philanthropic design which Mr. Boyd has opened."

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Very moderate arrivals of English wheat have taken place for our market this week, constwise as well by land carriage, yet the demand for that grain to-day, owing to the large imports of foreign, is very heavy, and prices are 2s lower than on Monday. The quantities of barley and oats, both of home and foreign growth, have been somewhat under the average, but the inferior qualities might have been purchased at a reduction of 1s per quarter. The best malting barley supported late rates, but all other kinds were the turn in favour of the buyers. With malt we were very moderately supplied, yet the trade was dull, at somewhat easier terms. Oats supported late rates, but beans and peas were very dull. Flour, as well as Indian corn and meal, remained the same.

ARRIVALS.—English: wheat, 3720; barley, 3560; oats, 3090 quarters. Irish: wheat, ——; barley, ——; oats, 4040. Foreign: wheat, 17,850; barley, 1060; oats, 8330. Flour, 2150 sacks and —— barrels. Malt, 3110 quarters.

Wheat, Essex and Kent, red, 45s to 52s; ditto, white, 50s to 58s; Norfolk and Suffolk, red, 45s to 48s; ditto, white, 48s to 49s; rye, 32s to 35s, grinding barley, 24s to 30s; distilling, 34s to 36s, malting ditto, 38s to 39s; Lincoln and Norfolk malt, 56s to 60s, brown ditto, 55s to 56s; Kingston and Ware, 60s to 62s; Chevalier, 62s to 65s, Yorkshire and Lincolnshire feed oats, 21s to 24s; potato ditto, 25s to 28s; Youghal and Cork, 19s to 21s; ditto, white, 20s to 22s; tick beans, new, 37s to 39s; ditto, old, 41s to 46s; grey peas, 40s to 42s; maple, 40s to 42s; white, 44s to 46s; ditto, 48s to 50s per quarter; Gloucester, old, 44s to 46s; ditto, new, 38s; Suffolk, 38s to 40s; Stockton and Yorkshire, 36s to 40s, per 280 lbs. Foreign. Dantzig wild wheat, —s to —s; white, s to —s; barley, —s to —s; oats, —s to —s; beans, —s to —s; peas, —s to —s per quarter. Flour, American, 24s to 25s; Italian, —s to —s, per barrel.

The Seed Market. So little business is doing in this market, that prices are next to nominal. Cakes are quite as dear.

Linseed, English, sowing, 50s to 52s. Baltic, crushing, 46s to 50s; Mediterranean and Odessa, 47s to 50s. Hempseed, 34s to 36s per quarter. Coriander, 18s to 21s per cwt. Brown Mustard-seed, 8s to 9s; white ditto, 7s to 7s 6d. Tares, 7s 6d to 7s 9d per bushel. English Rapeseed (new), £30 to £32, per last of 10 quarters. Linseed cakes, English, £9 10s to £10 10s; foreign, £9 0s to £10 0s per 1000; Rapeseed cakes, £6 0s to £6 10s per ton. Canary, 74s to 80s, per quarter. English Clover-seed, red, —s to —s; extra, —s to —s; white, —s to —s; extra, up to —s. Foreign, red, —s to —s; extra, —s; white, —s to —s; extra, —s per cwt.

Bread.—The prices of wheaten bread, in the metropolis, are from 7d to 7½d; of household ditto, 5½d to 6½d per 4lb loaf.

Imperial Weekly Average.—Wheat, 53s 8d; barley, 32s 0d; oats, 23s 4d; rye, 35s 7d; beans, 45s 9d; peas, 45s 3d.

The Six Weeks' Average.—Wheat, 53s 10d; barley, 32s 10d; oats, 23s; rye, 35s 4d; beans, 45s 3d; peas, 47s 0d.

Hops.—The public sales of 6000 packages, held on Thursday, went off heavily, and, in accordance with the general depression in the value of every description of property, the business doing is very small, at barely late rates.

Sugar. On the whole this market may be considered tolerably steady, but we have no improvement to notice in value. Lumps are in good demand and fetch full prices. Standard ditto, 91s 6d per cwt.

Provisions.—We have to report a decided improvement in the demand for Irish butter at an advance in the quotations of quite 1s per cwt. Carlow, Clonmel, and Cavrick, is selling at 86s to 90s; Cork, 82s to 90s; Limerick, 82s to 86s; Waterford, 82s to 86s; and Sligo and Tralee, 80s to 82s per cwt, all landed. On board, or for future delivery, we have very few sales to report. Fine Belfast, Newry, and Limerick, is making 80s per cwt; and Waterford, 78s. Foreign, 74s to 78s; and second and inferior qualities 50s to 67s per cwt. English butter has risen 1s to 2s per cwt. Fine Dorset, 104s; ordinary ditto, 96s to 98s per cwt; and fresh, 10s to 12s per dozen lbs. The supply of new Irish bacon being small, that article has advanced 1s per cwt. Prime Limerick Waterford, 64s to 67s; heavy, 62s to 63s per cwt. Irish thickened lard is selling freely, at from 72s to 76s per cwt. Fine and prime hams may be quoted at from 60s to 74s per cwt. Prime Irish pork, 80s to 84s; and prime mess pork, 86s to 88s per cwt per barrel. The clearances from Ireland, for the week ending last Saturday, were 2,000 firkins of butter, 500 flitches of bacon, 50 tons of pork, and 1,000 firkins of lard.

Smithfield (Friday).—The supply of stock this morning is very limited. Prime beasts are scarce, and fully as dear as on Monday last. Other kinds of cattle move off heavily, at very full prices, while the value of all other breeds was without change. There were on sale 600 beasts, 3,000 sheep, and 60 calves. Trade was very dull during the forenoon. The supply of sheep was small, owing to which, and the favourable change in the weather, the primest Downs realised an advance in the quotations of quite 2s per 8lb.—The primest old Downs producing 3s 4d per 8lb, without difficulty. Calves—the number of which was small—and in lately, at an improvement in value of fully 2s per 8lb. Pigs were in steady request, at full prices. Which cows were heavy, at from £15 to £18 each, including their small calf.

Per 8lb. to sink the offal:—Coarse and inferior beasts, 3s 2d to 3s 6d; second quality ditto, 3s 8d to 4s 0d; prime large ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 4d; prime Scots, &c., 4s 6d to 4s 10d; coarse-woolled ditto, 4s 2d to 4s 6d; prime South Down ditto, 5s 2d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 0d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; coarse and inferior sheep, 3s 4d to 3s 8d; second quality ditto, 3s 10d to 4s 2d; prime ditto, 4s 4d to 4s 6d; large coarse ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; prime small ditto, 5s 2d to 5s 4d; large coarse calves, 4s 0d to 4s 6d; prime small ditto, 4s 8d to 5s 0d; coarse and inferior pigs, 4s 0d to 4s 4d; second quality ditto, 4s 6d to 4s 8d; prime ditto, 4s 10d to 5s 0d. Suckling calves 20s to 30s; quarter old store pigs, 18s to 22s each.

Beasts, 1005; sheep, 140; sheep, 4000; calves, 70.

HENRY HANDLEY.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

There has not been any failure of importance during the past week, with the exception of Messrs. Trueman and Cook. This firm has been long regarded doubtfully; and, from the fact of their having lately pressed sales with rapidity, its intimate suspension did not create any great surprise in Mincing-lane. Generally, however, it is to be hoped for some time to come supposed to have surmounted its difficulties. The immediate cause of its suspension was a dishonoured acceptance for £10,000 of Messrs. Gower, Nephew, and Co., which was held by the Bank of England. Although the proximity of the stoppage, announces that the business of brokers will be carried on under a new firm, composed of Mr. Joseph Trueman, jun., Mr. H. T. Windsor, and Mr. J. P. Mason (not in the firm). The liabilities are estimated at £350,000, of which £70,000 may be provided for by other parties.

Notwithstanding, however, this failure, a general feeling exists that improvement is gradually advancing. The Bankers are taking money with more freedom, and good bills are doing at about 6¾ to 7 per cent. In fact, it is not too much to affirm that the panic is past, and our next difficulty is to overcome the stagnation that always exists after such convulsions. Ordinarily, from November till Christmas is the dullest period in the year. It cannot, therefore, be anticipated, with the remembrance of recent events, that any alteration in the usual course of trade will occur. This time has been in the meantime, there is much to struggle with. A large number of the population unemployed, and a decreasing revenue consequent thereon, are difficulties that affect both the tradesman and the capitalist. To expect, therefore, any material improvement, would be contrary to former experience. If, however, we have made one approach towards it by the renewal of confidence, it must be regarded as a great step gained.

The following meetings of creditors have been held during the past week:—A meeting of the creditors of Messrs. J. Cohen and Sons has elicited the following facts relative to the concern. Debts and liabilities, about £42,000; assets of which a large item is composed of debts in Jamaica), £37,000. A committee was ultimately appointed for further inquiry, with a view to a compromise, Messrs. Cohen placing themselves entirely in the hands of the meeting, which was adjourned. The creditors of S. S. Curtis, hide and leather factor, show assets of 4s. 10d. in the pound on debts and liabilities amounting to between £17,000 and £18,000. The offer made by Mr. Curtis was to pay a composition of 5s. in the pound by instalments, at periods of three, six, and nine months, the last instalment to be secured; and this proposal was accepted. The great deficiency in the accounts of Mr. Curtis arises from the difficulties encountered by him in struggling with the insolvent estate which he took up at the date of his father's decease.

It was agreed on Tuesday, at the adjourned meeting of creditors of Thomas, Son, and Leiferts, that in order to relieve the anxieties of bill-holders in the Lancashire district, to declare a dividend as early as possible, and hence a resolution was passed authorising the payment of 5s. in the pound, should Mr. J. Dobree, the chairman, after consultation with the professional adviser of the house and Mr. Leiferts, consider such payment advisable. It appeared that sufficient assets actually exist, when realised, to cover the principal debts of Messrs. Thomas and Loyd, to distribute this sum, but it was suggested whether it would not be better to wait, that the first dividend declared might be at least 8s. in the pound. The necessity of an immediate distribution is anticipated by the friends of the Manchester creditors, who were represented as consisting of a class of individuals to whom a dividend, though small in amount, would be exceedingly welcome, was, however, strongly advocated; and, under these circumstances, the resolution mentioned was carried. It may be added, that the explanations furnished on the subject of the accounts of the firm were regarded as satisfactory.

The creditors of Messrs. Abbott, Nottingham, and, of Aldermanbury, determined, at the meeting held this afternoon, to administer the estate under the bankrupt. The statement of account presented shows debts and liabilities to the extent of £24,234 3s., and assets to the extent of £13,305 9s. 5d.

A dividend of 6s. 8d. in the pound, payable on the 29th inst., was declared today under the estate of W. and J. Woodley, of the Corn Exchange, whose failure took place on the 27th of August

The suspension of Mr. Robert Farrand, a corn-factor, has caused considerable surprise, his credit in the market, on account of the supposed safe character of his business, being extremely good. The amount of his liabilities is understood to be small. Mr. Farrand is a Director of the London Joint Stock Bank, and was at one time member for Hedon, unsuccessfully for Stafford.

During the morning the failure of a broker was announced, the party being Mr Arthur Arkell. He had become a member of the House during the present year, and his transactions appear to be large.

The Committee of the Stock Exchange have been closely investigating the origin of intelligence received on Monday, by the electric telegraph, stating that a fall of ¾ per cent. had occurred, in consequence of several arrests having been made in Paris, from the discovery of an extensive political conspiracy. As, on Tuesday, the whole proved to be false, the party who wished to "operate for the Account" were anxious for an explanation. He stated that he was then engaged in tracing the parties from whom he received it, and an adjournment of the enquiry was the result. It is an affair of the utmost gravity, from the timidity of adjusting the various bargains made during the prevalence of the report. Expulsion from the Stock Exchange of the guilty party, is only one portion of the punishment. A criminal prosecution, in all probability, awaits the parties who forwarded the intelligence from Folkestone.

Consols opened on Monday with animation at 84¾ to 85, for Money. The rumour (afterwards proved to be false) of a failure at Leeds, added to positive information of the suspension of Messrs. Trueman and Cook, caused, however, an immediate fall to 84. A further decline afterwards occurred, from intelligence having been received of a fall in the Paris Bourse of 1f per cent., owing to the discovery of a political conspiracy in Paris; Consols closed at 83¾ to ⅞. On Tuesday, this intelligence, which was received by the electric telegraph, was false, and Consols improved to 83⅞ to ¾ soon after opening, advancing gradually to 84¾—a price that was not, however, maintained till the close of business, the last quotation being 84⅛ to ¼. Very little business occurred on Wednesday, and Consols closed precisely as on the preceding day. Extensive sales for Money, on Thursday, caused some depression in prices; and, as little speculative business was transacted, Consols closed at 84⅛ to ¼. Exchequer bills have been about par during the week, and India Stock is slightly improving. Bank Stock is also rather firmer. The closing prices of the week are, for Bank Stock, 189; Reduced, 84⅛; Three per Cent. 84⅛; Consols for Account, 84⅛; Exchequer bills, 1 Long Annuities, 8⅛; Ditto 30 years, 8⅝; India Stock, 233½; Consols for Account, 84; Exchequer Bills, 4.000, 1 d.s.; £500, 9 dis.; Small, 9 p.

The only movement in the Foreign Market during the week, has been in Mexican, on Monday, which advanced to 15¾. The few transactions that now take place scarcely even affect prices, which close nominally as follows:—Danish Bonds, 103¾; Three per Cent. 81½; Spanish Bonds, Deferred, 19; Passive, 4⅝; Certificates, 6¾. Long Annuities, 8⅛; Ditto 30 years, 8⅝; India Stock, 233½; Consols for Account, 84; Exchequer Bills, 4.000, 1 d.s.; £500, 9 dis.; Small, 9 p.

There was a slight tendency to improvement in the Share Market generally at the beginning of the week, but in this case now, this only produced sales. The consequence is a general reaction, with some few exceptions. The Market closed with Birmingham and Oxford Junction at 18¾; Aberdeen, 23; Birmingham, Wolverhampton, and Dudley, 18½; Bristol, Standford, and Birmingham, 33; Bristol and Exeter, 61¼; Ditto, Thirds, 11; Buckinghamshire, 21; dis.; Chester and Holyhead, Co-operation, 16; Ditto, Preferential, 16; Ditto, Perpetual, per Cent., No. 1, ¼ dis.; Ditto, York Extension, 8½; Ditto, North and Eastern, 46; East Lancashire, 20½; Great Northern, 12; Great Southern and Western (Ireland), 23½; Great Western, 226; Ditto, New, 46; Ditto, Half Shares, £30, £7; Ditto, New, £15, 16½; Great Western, Half Shares, 59; Ditto, Quarter Shares, 16; Ditto, Fifths, 3⅜; Ditto, New, £17, 7½; Hull and Selby, 3; Ipswich & Bury St. Edmunds, 10, 6o.; Ditto, New, Ex. Saturday Morning.—The English Market is dull and heavy at 83¾ to ⅞; but speculative purchases gradually improved prices to 84¼, when heavy sales on speculative Account reduced quotations to 83¾ to 84¼ for Money. The closing quotations are 83¾ to 84¼ for Money, and 84¼ for Time. In the Foreign and Share Markets no business of importance occurred.

PROPOSED SITE OF THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE AND IMPROVEMENTS.

SITE OF THE PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE.

Two centuries ago, on the 2nd of November, 1647, the idea of a general Record Office was mooted; and, about ten days since, the site of the proposed Office was determined on, and the necessary Parliamentary notices for making the new streets were given. It has thus taken two centuries for the authorities to make up their minds as to the expediency of a Repository for the National Records! The matter has, unquestionably, received due deliberation; and now that it has been decided on, we hope to see it executed on a scale correspondent with the importance and exigence of the object. Hitherto, public documents of great value have been kept in all sorts of buildings, and in all sorts of localities; in stables and lofts, in damp and cavernous vaults, and "dark retreats," by no means suited for depositories of state secrets, and details of the gay pageants and household expenses of Royalty.

Fortunately, the proposition for building a Record Office is associated with a plan or the improvement of the Health of the Metropolis; indeed, the former proposal has appeared in the Sixth Report of the Commissioners appointed by Warrant "to inquire into and consider the most effectual means of improving the Metropolis, and of providing increased facilities of communication with the same." Certain plans, prepared by Mr. Pennethorne, for the building of the Record Office, have been submitted to the Commissioners. Into the fitness of the depository they have not deemed it incumbent upon them to inquire minutely; their attention being directed, in the first place, to the plans for improving the communications in the vicinity of the proposed site; secondly, to the capacity and eligibility of the site itself; having reference not only to the exigencies of the present time, but to any probable demand for the enlargement of the building within the next century.

The new Office will be located on the Rolls estate; and, according to the ground-plans of Mr. Pennethorne, will cover considerable space; presenting a north frontage of more than 500 feet, which will be nearly in a line with, and eastward of, Carey-street, and an eastern frontage which will cross the present Fetter-lane and abut on Fleet-street. Even the eastern façade will be nearly 500 feet long.

We shall hereafter take occasion to illustrate the superstructure and ground plan of the Office itself. Our present object is to shew how great benefit will be secured to the metropolis generally by this improvement. This cannot be more directly done than by the annexed Engraving, from the Plan (No. 1, in the Report) "of the Rolls' Estate, and of other Properties in the neighbourhood thereof, shewing how they will be affected by the erection of the proposed Public Record Office, and by Public Improvements." This exhibits the requirements of the proposed Office, in respect to site whether by occupation of part of the Rolls Estate, or by acquisitions of other property,—and for the formation of streets around the building

In brief, the strong lines in the middle of our plan, denote the ground plan of the Record Office; the two oblong forms to the right being open courts of the building. Still further to the right is the new line of street proposed in place of Fetter-lane; and the strong lines at the top of the plan denote Carey-street, extending eastward.

Thus, the plan comprehends the making of a new line of street to be intermediate between Holborn and Fleet-street. The City is prepared to co-operate in opening a line which shall commence at the west end of Che apside,—pass along Paternoster-row, -cross Farringdon-street by a viaduct,—then enter Carey-street, Lincoln's Inn,—and end in Long Acre, opposite to the new Endell-street. The Metropolitan Improvement Commissioners, we are glad to see, are unanimously in favour of the plan. Even should the line of street be postponed, the Commissioners advise the immediate improvement of Fetter-lane, and the erection of the new Record Repository. By this means, knots of courts and passages, unhealthy almost to pestilence, would be swept away, a narrow and tortuous street got rid of, and an immense amount of benefit insured to this overpeopled metropolitan locality

GALLOWAY'S ROTARY STEAM-ENGINE.

THE Engraving, Fig. 1, represents this unique little Engine at work. It is used to drive the blowing-machine at Mr. Tyrell's factory, at Deptford, which that gentleman states to require about four horses' power; and this it performs with such energy as to leave no doubt that it possesses, not only the force requisite for the work imposed, but something more. A tolerably correct idea of its size may be formed by comparison with the man in attendance; but, as it has been already described as about the dimensions of a "hat-box," it may be as well to state that the diameter of the cylinder outside is eighteen inches, and the depth eight inches. Within this works what the inventor calls "the piston;" but which, a piston, as ordinarily understood, conveys no idea of.

Fig. 2, is a transverse section through the middle of the cylinder and piston. These are five inches deep; the piston works on a crank, the centre of which is compelled to move round the middle circle, thus communicating a rotary motion to the pulley carrying the band in Fig. 1. The steam is admitted by a pipe into the steam-chest, the opening into the working part of the cylinder being covered with a plate of metal, to which the piston is firmly secured, the centres of each revolving round the middle circle before referred to. Through this plate, onone side of nearly the extremity of each arm of the piston, are holes to admit the steam into the cells, and so arranged as to be opened and shut by the surface of the cylinder over which it passes in its eccentric revolution with the piston. The exhaustion is effected from the bottom of the cylinder, and the escape is at the pipe shown at the side of Fig. 2. The action of the steam, in giving motion to the piston, A, will be understood by reference to the same diagram: it is now supposed to be admitted into the cells a, b, c, which, from the exquisite form and workmanship of cylinder and piston, are perfectly steam tight, and is forcing it in the direction of the dotted piston, B; meanwhile the exhaustion is going on in the cells d, e, f; and this double action is continued uniformly during the whole revolution of the crank, and each cell continues, also, in every position of the piston, to be steam tight! Practical workmen will appreciate this great excellence, and even the ingenious inventor may congratulate himself that the present development of mechanical skill has enabled him to perfect an invention which had it been discovered thirty years ago, would most, likely have failed for want of art sufficient to carry it out.

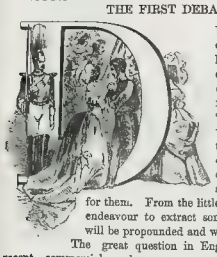
No. 291.—Vol. XI.] FOR THE WEEK ENDING SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1847. WITH SUPPLEMENT GRATIS. [SIXPENCE.

THE FIRST DEBATE.



DULY, and with all fit ceremony, the Session has opened; the political drama has fairly commenced: the curtain rose on Tuesday, not to "soft music," but to voices in bitter contention, each with a different estimate of the nature of our present difficulties, and a different remedy for them. From the little less than Chaos we will endeavour to extract some kind of clue to what will be propounded and what will be opposed.

The great question in England is, of course, the recent commercial embarrassments; the conduct of those who control the Currency, as the cause of that embarrassment; and the policy of the Government in its interference with the Bank of England, which, like the money it holds, is said to be the root of all evil. It appears, then, that the Government will not have to apply to Parliament for a bill of indemnity for infringing the law, inasmuch as the Bank Charter Act has not been departed from. The mere knowledge on the part of the public that the Bank could act freely, if it thought proper, was enough to restore a certain degree of confidence. This was the chief argument in favour of the Government interference; and the concession, slight as it was, was successful. Here, again, the proverbial luck of Sir Robert Peel is apparent: his Bill, so loudly accused of putting all classes to the pinch, stands the shock unmodified; bullion begins to flow in; and the Exchanges are turning in our favour, though nothing has been changed in it. The Ministers escape easily; a few expressions of regret in the Royal Speech, and some hopeful flourishes in the House that the worst is over, leave the much-abused Bank Charter Act to go on as before. Thus is one great difficulty disposed of; but, unfortunately, there are plenty of others.

The Railways are establishing a continual drain on the means of the people; they absorb profits, if there are any; employ the money required for regular trade, and altogether dislocate and confound people's plans and calculations. This question will now, after the country has been half ruined, be taken up by the Government; the gold-devouring monster is to be taught moderation; a hook is to be put into the nose of Leviathan; though, as Parliament is constituted, the task will be one of difficulty. Chairmen and Directors are very strong in the New House of Commons; in most cases they are disposed to proceed as rapidly as may be; the Shareholders have lately begun to wish the expenditure were moderated; the Government, at last, alarmed by the derangement of the Currency, is disposed to take a similar view of the matter. The reluctance to "interfere with private enterprise," gives way when that private enterprise begins to embarrass the Government. One of the acts of this supplementary session, therefore, is to be one extending the time for completing the lines in course of construction. There is also to be a supervision of the Railway Bills of this session; the Government, it is rumoured, will claim a power of deciding, on due inquiry, what plans it will be advisable to proceed with, and what will not.

It will at once strike the reader that this might have been done with ten times the advantage it can have now, two years ago. When those few whom the mania left in possession of their reasoning faculties called on the Government, for its own sake, to assert some such power, and not let all who chose to get up a scheme, and apply for a bill to cut and carve the face of the country, and dip as deeply into the pockets of the public as the credulity of the said public permitted them, the most complete apathy was exhibited. The whole island went mad, and the Government complacently looked on the lunatics. Now the reaction has come, the medicine is produced that should have been given in the height of the fever. When the house is burned down, the watchmen assiduously present themselves with the petty squirt of a garden-engine. It is the great, the besetting sin of our statesmen, that they never will move one inch, befor they are driven by public indignation, or public calamity. There does not seem to be one man who dares take the opinion of the few, act on it, and trust to the future to prove it is for the advantage of the many.

Hence arise all kinds of vacillations, and changes of policy, making it impossible to believe that those who govern have any clear idea of their own duties or the necessities of the age. If we must distinguish any one Minister as having less decision than another, it is the present Chancellor of the Exchequer; Sir R. Peel, it is said, has always "three courses open to pursue;" but of those he can select one, and stick to it. Sir C. Wood has two courses on every question, and takes both, to the infinite confusion of all things connected with them. Last session, he stoutly refused all advances to Irish Railways, on principle; before it closed, he did what he condemned; he obstinately refused to do anything to relieve the monetary pressure, asserting that the Government could not interfere; within twenty-four hours appeared the letter to the Bank. Up to the present time he would not hear of checking railway enterprise; now the control is assumed—exactly eighteen months too late. What misery and ruin would have been saved had the Government had the courage to do in time what they are attempting to do now?

The Currency and the Railways are the great subjects of English interest, for political theories are quite in abeyance. But when we turn to the other great theme of the week's debate, Ireland, an infinity of questions rush upon us, all of extreme difficulty; Ireland is, indeed, the great political Sphynx, propounding to England her terrible enigmas; and, unless we can solve them speedily, we shall still further justify the comparison by being devoured by her. The pauperism of Ireland, if it continues to spread and deepen, will absorb the wealth of England, and drag it down, not quite to, perhaps, but towards, her own miserable level.

The Debate, as far as it has brought out the Irish members, does not give any prospect that Ireland has sent us the men fit to meet the occasion. The Young Irelanders, split into sections that do nothing but vapour and abuse each other, only prove, by their manifold follies, how salutary was the check O'Connell held them in. His own course was not, in all things, wise; but those he has left behind will make it so by comparison. When every moment should be given to action, they draw up strings of resolutions, all true, perhaps, in the abstract, but as useless, at present, as a code of Laws for the Millennium. They come to Parliament, and it is the same: John O'Connell, the Leader, if they acknowledge any, has nothing but the old, oft-told, tale of misery. Every hour lost in proving what needs no proof is a positive crime, and a positive necessity. If Englishmen know nothing of Ireland let those who do take the initiative. Do not talk, but produce something: propose your remedy: come forward with your measures for which you are prepared to take the responsibility: shame the Government into movement: surely, among one hundred and fifty of the chosen leaders of the people, one, at least, may be found who can do, more than declaim. Motions, praying the Queen to assemble the Parliament in Dublin motions for a Committee to inquire into the mode in which the Union was effected, are worse than folly at this time: they are criminal. Incapacity at Westminster will not be wisdom on the Liffey; and the Union was obtained by means disgraceful to all parties, English and Irish alike. Those two points being thus briefly settled—and ten nights' debate will come to no other conclusion—we implore Mr. Anstey, Mr. Feargus O'Connor, Mr Grattan, Mr. Roche, and all the representatives of Ireland, not to continue as they have begun, or the Session will only be a six weeks' squabble, exciting much ill blood, but producing no practical result.

IRELAND.

STATE OF THE COUNTRY.

The news from Ireland continues to be of a most heart-rending nature. The assassin still strikes his fatally certain blow.

The following details are given from Limerick:—The victims of assassination were Mr Ralph Hill, sub-agent to David Fitzgerald, Esq., and a land bailiff named Madden. Mr. Hill, in the discharge of his duty, had made a distress on Wednesday on corn belonging to John Quain, tenant to Benjamin Freud, Esq., who was indebted to his landlord to a large amount. On Thursday they visited Quain's house for the purpose of removing the corn, where they were met by Quain's son, with whom Mr. Hill was talking, when four shots were fired at him and his bailiffs from behind the haggard, and Madden and Hill were killed on the spot. One of the keepers, James M'Mahon, was wounded on the head, the skull having been laid bare by slugs, and Flannery received the contents of a gun shot in the back of the hand. The carmen who went out to bring in the corn seized fled in all directions when the shots were fired. More recent accounts state that Madden was not shot dead, but that little hopes are entertained of his recovery. Two men, named Skehan and O'Brien, are in custody on suspicion for the murder.

His assailants literally stoned their victim to death, and cleft his head with a hatchet The deceased had decreed several persons indebted to him at the late quarter sessions, and hence, it is supposed, the fatal vengeance. Dillon has left a young wife and several children. His general character was that of a prudent, industrious man. It is ascertained that four men committed this atrocious outrage."

In reference to the disturbed state of Tipperary, the Earl of Donoughmore, as Lieutenant, in reply to a deputation of the Magistrates of North Riding, observes:—"As Lieutenant of the County, I have felt it my duty to accompany a deputation to the Lord Lieutenant, by whom a statement was laid before his Excellency, which clearly proved the impossibility of meeting the secret combinations with which we have to contend by the ordinary operation of the law. Lord Clarendon fully felt the force of our representations. [illegible] seen the necessity for prompt and energetic measures. I can only say at present, that I firmly rely on his wisdom and determination to do whatever can be done to restore the reign of law and order. With this conviction on my mind, I do not consider it expedient to call upon the Magistracy of the Lieutenancies of the North Riding; in my opinion, they could add no new facts to those stated by the deputation."

KILLARNEY.—At the last meeting of the guardians of the Killarney Union one thousand paupers were reported to be in the house. Mr. Slinott, one of the lecturers appointed by the Royal Agricultural Society, at the suggestion of the Lord-Lieutenant, presented himself to the Board, and, having expressed his willingness to proceed on his mission through the Union, asked for the advice and assistance of the Guardians.—Mr Mahony asked the learned lecturer whether he spoke Irish?—"No," replied he, "but gentlemen requiring any assistance would, of course, send an interpreter."—A smile of contempt passed over the face of the interrogator. A long discussion ensued, the upshot of which was, that the Board decided on repudiating the Lord-Lieutenant's lecturer.—"We do not require information," said one, "we have plenty of that, but what we do want is money."—"The allowance," said Mr. S. Lalor, "Does Lord Clarendon suppose that such miracles would be wrought by this mission of any meddlesome and drainage, without something more substantial than words—something more munificent than the donation of £50?" (Hear, hear," cried half-a-dozen other Guardians.) Mr. Cronin quite agreed with Mr. S. Lalor that it was a humbug.

GREAT SOUTHERN AND WESTERN EXTENSION TO THURLES.—On Saturday last Sir John Macneill made a trial trip from Ballybrophy to Thurles, a distance of 22 miles. This extension of the main line will be open to the public in a month, making a total of 74 miles—50 on the main line, and 24 of the Carlow branch—and the whole distance, 90 miles, from Thurles to Dublin, was run in three hours, including six stoppages.

CASE OF MR. LANAZE, LATE STOCK [illegible]ER.—On Monday the Court of Queen's Bench decided in favor of the motion in arrest of judgment. Mr. Brown in consequence left to begin proceedings de novo. Mr. Lanaze, it will be recollected, was convicted of embezzlement at the Commission Court for appropriating to his own use the sum of £9000, handed to him by Mr. Clayton Browne, of the county Carlow, to purchase Government stock

The Presse announces the conclusion of the negotiations between Rome and Austria respecting Ferrara. Austria is to remain in possession of the citadel, and the Pope of the city. The mutual rights of both States were to be officially recognised. The Presse, however, adds, that the intelligence requires confirmation

A frightful collision took place on Saturday morning last, on the Paris and Orleans Railway, at a place called Juvisy, thirty short distance on the Paris side of Orleans. The whole of the persons in the carriages (soldiers and operatives) thirty-six in number, were more or less hurt; several mortally, it was feared. The list of casualties has been published, and shows that two were wounded mortally, eight had their limbs fractured; seven otherwise severely injured; and thirteen slightly hurt: in all, thirty wounded.

The following appointments are made:—Mdlle. Delmay was set at liberty on Wednesday evening, in virtue of an ordinance, declaring that there was no evidence against her, rendered by the Chambre du Conseil of the Tribunal of the First Instance. Mdlle. Delmay had been in prison since the 10th August, a period of three months."

The receipts of the French railroads, during the last week, were:—Paris and Orleans, 211,760f.; the Centre, 63,895f.; Paris and Rouen, 173,059f.; Rouen and Havre, 68,427f.; Orleans and Tours, 95,172f.; Great Northern, 345,838f.; and Amiens and Abbeville, 14,414f.

La Presse (Paris Journal) publishes a letter from Syra, stating as a report, that the United States had at length obtained a footing in the Mediterranean by the purchase of that island (Syra) from the Greek Government, for a sum of money equal to the English portion of the debt of Greece, and which would be immediately discharged.

The Council-General of the Seine has passed a formal vote on the question of Free-Trade, declaring that it is of opinion that, in the present state of things, the protection of national industry ought to be maintained; but it at the same time considers that the Customs question calls for revision and improvement.

BELGIUM.

The interruption of the diplomatic relations between Belgium and the Holy See excites great sensation at Brussels. This interruption took place under the following circumstances:—A few days before the last Ministry of the Catholic party was overthrown, it appointed an Ambassador to the post then vacant at the Court of Rome. The new Ministers paid no attention to the nomination thus made. After having revoked it, they selected to represent the Belgian Government at Rome one of the most respectable men in Belgium, M. Leclercq. But, whilst the Belgian Ministry wrote to Rome to give notice of this nomination, the Catholic party is said to have addressed to the Pope a sort of denunciation against the new Liberal Ambassador. The Holy Father refused, in consequence, to receive M. Leclercq, accounting for his refusal [illegible] appeared to the Belgian Government to imply an intervention of the Holy See in the domestic affairs of Belgium. The Belgian Ministry consequently declared that it would not send an Ambassador to Rome. A curious [illegible] has been [illegible] at Brussels, in consequence of being [illegible] the late [illegible] of Mdlle. Lavaux. The man is named Rossel; he arrived in Bruges from Brussels about a month ago, in which latter town he kept a public-house. A visit paid to their house has brought to light some circumstances which will probably lead to the conviction of the guilty parties. All the purchases made by the prisoners have been paid for in pieces of ten florins; a great many coins of this description were stolen at the time of the murder, and it is proved that he has sold some wedges of gold and silver. The accused were conducted to Brussels on the 18th inst.

THE GERMAN STATES.

After several days' deliberation, the Postal Congress, consisting of representatives of the different German Powers, which assembled at Dresden, has adopted a resolution, to the effect that the postage of a single letter, of a weight not exceeding 25 grammes (about three quarters of an ounce), shall in the States of the Postal Union pay 2 kreutzer (a sheps more than 2½ centimes) for a distance of six leagues, 5 kreutzer (21 centimes) for 20 leagues, and 10 kreutzer (42c.) for all distances exceeding 20 leagues.

SPAIN.

It is reported in the highest quarters of Paris that the Queen of Spain is in a condition which promises an heir to the Spanish throne.

The Spanish Cortes were opened on the 15th, with a Speech from the Queen, which is not much more communicative than such discourses generally are. It states, however, that the negotiations with the court of Rome were going on favourably towards their termination. The finances are to be improved—every is to be a just law for the regulation of the press—the people are to have reasonable liberty, and the Montemolinist faction is to be crushed.

The Queen Mother's return has excited much curiosity, and, contrary to former precedent, received not a single cheer on her way to or from the church. Her august mother was not, however, treated with similar indifference. Everywhere on her passage she was greeted with cries of excommunion as well as deep

At a meeting of the majority of the Deputies, a resolution has been adopted to impeach Salamanca. The grounds of the impeachment are not stated

QUEEN ISABELLA'S FORTUNE.—We learn from a letter from Senor Pena y Aguavo, on his administration of the Civil List of Queen Isabella, it appears that the Queen had to pay 32,769,470 reals (rather more than £320,000) for the dowry of the Duchess de Montpensier, and that 60,000,000 of reals are still due; that 6,000,000 were taken from the Queen's funds to form a capital abroad, of which four were consigned to M. Rothschild, to be paid to a well-known General; that the arrears due from the Civil List to the Queen have been converted into rentes, and that this conversion has produced 80,000,000 of reals.

The Clamor Publico states that permission to return to Spain has been given to the actor Mirá, whose marriage with the Infanta Maria Fernanda is also to undergo great sensation. The Infant Don Francisco has, it is said, determined to return to the capital.

The Chamber of Deputies elected M. Mon as its president: he was chosen by 135 votes. General San Miguel obtained 39; M. Olozaga, 1; M. Bardaji, 1; and two others were lost.

ITALY.

The Grand Duke of Tuscany and the King of Sardinia have issued proclama tions, in which they condemn, in strong terms, all popular manifestations having for their object to impose upon them conditions as to their policy. At the same time, however, they cause it to be understood that they will act with becoming dignity in the path of reform upon which they have entered.

Lord Minto had an audience of the Pope on the 8th.

Professor Betti has been translated as censor of the press. A fête was to take place on the 15th to celebrate the installation of the Council of State

Monsignor Corboli Bussi left Turin on the 9th for Modena, for the purpose of inviting the Duke to join the Customs Union.

The Alba, Florence Journal, of the 13th inst., announces as positive the entry of the Austrian troops on the territory of Modena. A battalion of those troops had arrived at Carpi, three leagues from the frontier of the Duchy, and others were believed to have taken possession of Massa Carrara

The Pope had appointed one of the halls of the Vatican for the meeting of the provincial deputies, and placed two Court carriages at their disposal.

The Patrie of Florence announces that the Duke of Modena had, on the 12th inst., ordered the occupation of Pontremoli. The inhabitants of that town, however, had completed preparations of defence, and were then in a position to repel an invasion of the Modenese troops. The entire population was under arms; barricades had been erected in the streets, and the able bodied men of the neighbouring country, to the number of more than 2,000, had entered the place, and offered their services to the authorities. On the 8th, 150 men, armed with [illegible] Zucchi, the General-in-Chief of the Modenese, and volunteers from Pisa and Leghorn, had likewise arrived. The Grand Duke of Tuscany, on the other hand, had concentrated all his disposable forces along the frontier.

The Duke Sforza Cesarini, who married Miss Shirley, the grand-daughter of Byron, [illegible] years, has lately exceeded in establishing an infant school at [illegible] to introduce this system of education on his estates, but during the pontificate of the late Pope infant schools were strictly prohibited. Pius IX., however, has acted with greater liberality, and according to the last census, the Duke has placed the establishment under the charge of an experienced teacher from Piacenza, where the best regulated infant schools are to be found.

AUSTRIA.—OPENING OF THE HUNGARIAN DIET.

In the afternoon of the 11th inst. the Emperor and Empress of Austria, accompanied by the Archdukes Francis, Joseph, and Albert, arrived at Preaburg, the capital of Upper Hungary, from Vienna. They were received, on disembarking, by the Archduke Stephen, and about 800 magnates and nobles.

On the 12th, at eleven in the morning, the Hungarian Diet was opened in due form. The Emperor, dressed in the splendid uniform of the Hungarian Hussars, was surrounded by all the magnates of Hungary, and, after an opening speech by Count Appony, he endeavoured himself to address a few words to the assembly in the Hungarian language. The Royal propositions, eleven in number, were then laid upon the table, and the Emperor and his suite withdrew. The first is respecting the election of a Palatine, the second relates to military regulations, the third to the rights of voting of the free cities and communes. Paragraph six, by the Archduke Stephen, and about 800 magnates and nobles. Paragraph six, which concerns the total abolition of all custom duties between Hungary and the other Austrian dominions. The propositions altogether produced a favourable effect.

The first proposition is already fulfilled.

Archduke Stephen was proclaimed Palatine of Hungary by acclamation.

The Austrian journals are loud in their praise and express flowing accounts of the reception of the Emperor. Scarcely, however, had the acclamations halling the new Palatine ceased, when Kossuth, the Liberal champion, rose and moved, that the Latin form of the oath, to be taken by the new Palatine, be changed into the Magyar dialect, and the proposition was hailed with deafening applause.

It is stated in a letter from Cracow of the 10th, that the tomb of M. Zajaskowski, President of the Political Criminal Tribunal, who was assassinated on the 4th, has to be guarded night and day by strong detachments of cavalry and infantry, it being reported that the people intended to drag up the body and hang it on a gallows.

The Government of Vienna has interdicted all the Roman journals from entering the States of Austria.

PRUSSIA.

Accounts from Berlin of the 17th instant, state that the Cabinet has been engaged in bringing to an end the long-intended municipal law for those parts of the Russian dominions into which that institution has not been introduced as yet. The March of Brandenburgh, the province of Saxony and Pomerania will be principally benefited by this important law

THE POLISH PROCESS.—BERLIN, Nov. 17th.—This was a solemn day in Court. At one o'clock the President rose, and, addressing the counsel for the Polish defendants, inquired whether they had any further defence to make; the counsel unanimously replied in the negative, upon which the President said, "The proceedings are herewith closed. The day for pronouncing the sentence cannot yet be named." This will probably not take place for a fortnight or three weeks, and the reading will probably occupy two or three days; it will be given in German, and only the tenour will be translated into Polish.

The Universal Prussian Gazette contains a Cabinet order, dated November 18, and addressed to the authorities of Neufchatel. In this order the King ratifies the declaration of neutrality adopted by the Legislative body of Neufchatel in its sitting of the 29th October, and maintains that neutrality throughout the period of the duration of the civil war.

RUSSIA.

Russian intelligence recently received, via Germany, states that the cholera continues prevalent in Moscow, without, however, having yet developed any particularly malignant character. On the 17th of October, the number of cases gradually declined. After the lapse of five days it rose once more. Up to the 25th of October (from the 30th of September), the number of cases amounted to 536, and that of consequent deaths to 167. The intelligence of the last week from the other parts of the Empire visited by the pestilence is equally favourable. The epidemic, throughout, presents few malignant features.

A letter from Warsaw, of October 31, says—"M. de Rudow has just arrived here from Naples. The mission, relative to the religious affairs of Poland, which he was entrusted with at Rome by the Emperor of Russia, is looked on to have failed. The present conduct of the Russian Government with respect to the Catholic religion in Poland is more and more hostile. The new code declares the Greco-Russian worship to be the dominant religion in Poland, notwithstanding that there is but a comparatively small number of persons professing it in that country. Any one also may pass from the Catholic worship to the Greco-Russian; but if any passes from the latter to the former, he is liable to be sent for two years to the Caucasus, and afterwards to be shut up in a convent until he repents his fault, and testifies his intention to turn back to his old belief. In addition, from 1846, the Russian law relative to mixed marriages is to be applied to the kingdom of Poland, and all male children are to be brought up in the Greco-Russian religion.

SWEDEN.

It is stated, in a letter from Stockholm, of the 14th, that a serious riot had taken place at Gottenburgh, arising out of a domiciliary visit. All the public lamps were broken, and the Custom House and the house of the chief of the police were entered by the mob and pillaged. Order was at length restored by the intervention of an armed force.

WEST INDIES

The Jamaica Legislative Session was opened on the 19th of October, in a long speech by the Governor, which is generally commented upon in terms of satisfaction by the Jamaica Journals. His Excellency cautiously abstains from pledging the Government to any specific measures, but holds out hopes that something effectual will be done to relieve the depressed state of the colony

In answer to the address of the Governor of Jamaica, the House of Assembly have declared their readiness to provide for the contingencies of the island to the 30th of December, 1848, in the fervent hope that, by that period, ample relief will be afforded by the Imperial Parliament, and the colony be rescued from impending ruin

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE.

By the Mary Anne Indiaman, Captain Parke, which left the Cape on the 18th of September, we have advices to that date. No movement of any important character had taken place since our last, but Sir Henry Pottinger was organising his forces for a grand coup in a few days after the departure of the Mary Anne.

The Commander of the Forces, Lieutenant-General Sir George Berkeley, quitted Graham's Town on the 11th of September in person to the command of the troops on the immediate frontier. He proceeded the short route to Fort Peddie.

Our marauding Kaffirs have been shot near the Gola Heights. They were pursued by some of the Rifle Brigade, overtaken, and fell by the bullets of these active and experienced hands.

THE UNITED STATES.

It is stated in the latest advices from the United States, that the Government had determined to open diplomatic relations with the Papal See, and that Colonel J. D. Sulle, of Philadelphia, was likely to be the gentleman selected as Charge d'Affaires to Rome.

CANADA AND NEW BRUNSWICH

Letters from New Brunswick mention the destruction, by fever, of the greater part of the crew and passengers, 500 in number, of the emigrant ship Avon, lately arrived at Quebec from Ireland. We learn from the same source of intelligence, it also appears that the loss of life on board the Londonia, which attracted attention some time back, amounted to 249 casualties, out of 402 passengers, to which must be added the loss of 23 more since the publication of the official report.

In the course of last week a meeting of the Directors of the St. Andrew's and Quebec Railway, New Brunswick, was held, when Mr. Laurie, the engineer, read a report, setting forth the particulars of a minute re-survey of that part of the line extending from St. Andrew's to Wamsig, a distance of about thirteen miles, which is upwards of two miles less than the original estimate. We suppose the Atlantic with the Canadas, and that it is intended for the transportation from side water into the interior, of freight, such as flour, salted provisions, groceries, &c., to be brought by steam and sail-vessels to St. Andrew's, and for bringing from the interior heavy and bulky articles to be shipped, such as timber, deals, plaster, &c. And as, with such a traffic, there would be steam boats running in connexion with the railroad, it is supposed that a depôts on tidal water, with convenient wharfs for vessels, so that the railroad cars may be brought alongside the shipping, and heavy freight discharged without intermediate transport. The site for the terminal depôt at St. Andrew's is chosen at the northside of the town, and of the various routes to it that is chosen which was the line originally surveyed by the Government, viz., by the Chamcook Lakes to the L[illegible] house. Close to the town a cutting of 15 or 20 feet will be necessary, for a very short distance, through a rocky stratum, which will be available for the construction of the wharfs. To the lakes no expensive works are requisite. Along the margin of the lakes there are in very heavy cuttings at any point, but a considerable aggregate of excavation; the estimate for the whole distance, however [illegible] not exceed £4000 per mile for engineering, wooden rails and all. The most expensive structure will be a bridge of 300 feet in length; and, beyond the lakes, the levels are very easy. The total length will be 12 miles 64 chains, and the steepest gradient 1 in 150. This line is a most important one as being the first link of connexion between our three great North American provinces.

THE RIVER PLATE

The last arrival from the River Plate announces the withdrawal of the obnoxious decree, which had been published by Government at Monte Video, but not acted upon. This decree imposed an additional duty on the importation of salt and other produce, and would probably have realised between fifty and sixty thousand dollars per month. Against such an additional impost the foreign Consuls had protested, and the Government has given way with the British trade. The Griffin packet had arrived ont at Monte Video, with mails from England to 4th Aug. There is nothing important from Buenos Ayres, where matters continued much as before. The Government advances had fully approved of everything done by Rosas during the late negotiations.

INDIA.

Letters from India, China, and Egypt, have been received, in which parties of the Overland Mail Packet Company are [illegible] from Calcutta to Bombay, from Madras to the [illegible] and from the latter to the other [illegible] to the 29th of September, and to the 30th of September, at Aden, on the 3rd of September.

The Governor-General of India had put off his departure from the hills, and was not expected to reach Calcutta until after the arrival of his successor

In Sciude the Commissioner and suite remained at Kurrachee. It is intended to retain intact the military appointments in civil offices of administration made by Sir Charles Napier. The Governor of Bombay will not visit Scinde until about the middle of November. A tender had been despatched of the Indian Navy for the conveyance of mails by steam-vessels three times in the month between Bombay and Kurrachee during the fine season.

There is nothing new from the north-west frontier of India.

The steamer Indus, which left Bombay for Kurrachee on the 5th of October, on the 7th struck on some rocks thirty miles from Dhu-head. A large hole was made in her bottom. The crew and passengers were safe. The crew were busy in removing the boilers from the wreck when the news left. Mr. J. Galbraith was the acting master in command of the Indus

CHINA.

Advices from Hong Kong to the 29th of September have arrived.

The state of affairs in Canton appeared more satisfactory, and general quiet prevailed; confidence seemed in a great measure restored—money was more easy, with greater activity in trade. The Colonial Government seemed to think well of the posture of affairs, for tenders had been advertised for ships to convey the 42nd Native Regiment to Madras, and the 18th Royal Irish to Calcutta; leaving the colony with a part only of the 95th and the Ceylon Rifles, which may be considered a small garrison.

SIMPSON'S SUBMERGED PROPELLER.

When the first innovation was made upon the rights of the "ancient wicker fan," by the introduction of the four-vaned blower on the floor of the barn to create an artificial current of air, and when afterwards that same simple agent was enclosed in the drum of the winnowing machine, where a direction was given to the current by a volute form of casing—simple and cheap in its construction and application -giving out a gentle and diffuse breeze, just sufficient to drive off the chaff and nothing more—it was regarded as a mere apology for the "sturdy old bellows;" but now, after the lapse of upwards of a century, we find the whole troop of blowing apparatus, from the forge to the smelting furnace, rapidly retiring before their powerful though diminutive rival, which for "ambition knows no bounds" having triumphed in one element, is now seeking to win fresh laurels in another; and that, too, with good chance of success, if we may judge from the results of a trial trip, made by Mr T. B. Simpson, on Monday week, on board the Albion, a steam vessel built and fitted, entirely at his own expense, with his Patent Submerged Propeller, and reported in the Times to have acquired a speed of from ten to twelve knots per hour.

The Propeller is, as before remarked, the old blowing machine immersed in water, and acting on that element precisely the same as with air, i.e., collecting it in the centre, and throwing it off at the circumference of the vanes, from whence it impinges on a segment of a circle, placed so as to form a volute to the centre, and is by that made to leave the opening in a strong current parallel to the side of the vessel; a reference to Fig. 1 will explain this, and also the contrivance for reversing the action. A A A A are four vanes, each one foot in length and eighteen inches broad, made to revolve either way. B B B is a segment of a circle, made of thin metal, and forming the barrel to the drum inside of which the vanes revolve, and which guides the projected water in the direction b or c, by merely changing its position when the vanes are reversed, this is effected by the levers D D, by which the segment is attached to the upper and lower plates of the drum; so that when the motion is reversed, the action of the water against the inside of the segment at E E throws it over to the position shown by the dotted lines C C C, and the levers F F. Fig. 2 is a midship-plan, with the deck broken away, to show the position of the propellers E E, and the direction of the current F F. Fig. 3 is a section through midships, showing the elevation of the Propeller and the arrangement for communicating motion from the engine.

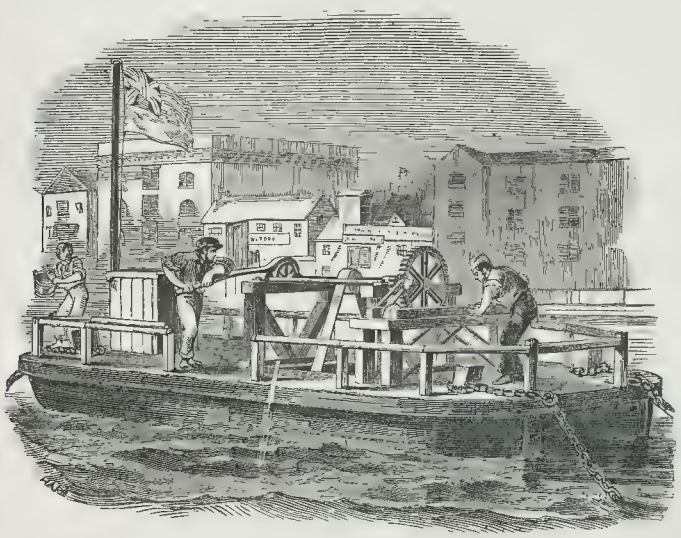
Altogether, this is a most important problem; and whether solved or not by the labours of Mr. Simpson, he has entitled himself to a niche in the temple of fame, for the indomitable perseverance and talent he has displayed in endeavouring to carry out a principle which he believes to be true, and which he has spared neither pains nor expense to prove. We heartily wish him success.

One of the favourite ideas of the King of Prussia was to enrich his kingdom with an administration of justice free of all expense to the suitors, but, after a careful inquiry into the means of carrying it out, it has been found necessary to abandon it; first, because it would be too heavy a burden to the Budget; and next, because it would increase and encourage the spirit of Litigation.

Strange Patents. Among the latest lists of patents is to be found one of a very curious nature, and thus described:—"An invention for making paper for the building of houses, bridges, ships, boats, and all sorts of wheel carriages, sedan chairs, tables, and bookcases, either entirely of paper, or wood and iron covered with paper." In the same list there is mentioned a patent for "roasting a great number of joints of meat, fowls, &c., horizontally and vertically," on a mathematical principle.

A Minister Apprehended as a Deserter.—On Sunday, the minister who officiated in the forenoon in Greenhead quoad sacra Church, Canning-street, Calton, was, immediately after the conclusion of the service, apprehended as a deserter by two sergeants of the 71st Regiment. His sable robes presented a striking contrast to the gaudy attire of his companions in arms, and attracted an immense crowd of onlookers. The preacher absented himself from the barracks only on the preceding Monday. He took up his quarters with a highly respectable lady in Charlotte-street, under the assumed name of the Rev. Mr. Bertram. How he got an introduction to the Established Presbytery, so as to get admittance as a preacher into Greenhead Church, does not appear. His real name is Thomas Watkins. His father is a minister of the Gospel in the neighbourhood of London, and our hero was educated to the ministry; but, previous to his being licensed, he enlisted. The Rev. Mr. Bertram is rather an enticing young man, and a very pleasing speaker. Under this assumed name he is said to have produced a favourable impression on the fair portion of the audience. It is, therefore, well it should be known that the Rev. Mr. Bertram, when reduced to private Watkins, is a married man, having his wife in the barracks.



THE TIDAL MILL.

THE TIDAL MILL.

For some weeks past, a "queer-looking craft," as Jack would call it, has been moored a little below the Southwark Bridge, on the Borough side, and the attention of the curious and scientific has been considerably excited towards it by the novelty of machinery without any visible motive power, being constantly in operation on its deck. That "craft" is the experimental vessel belonging to the "Tidal Mill Company." It is constructed as shown in the diagram—a section across midships—in two parts; the space between is for the reception of a wheel 7 feet in diameter, with six vanes, each 5 feet 6 inches broad at the periphery, and tapering to 7 inches near the centre: it is like a screw-propeller—is placed at right angles to the current, which gives it motion, the speed of which, it has been calculated, communicates power in the following ratio:—

Tide—miles per hour	2	3	4	5	6
Wheel, 7 feet diameter, working horse power.. ..	2	3	4	5	6
Do., 14 do. do. do ..	8	12	16	20	24

On the circumference of the wheel is a rim of thin iron, carrying a band which drives a pulley on deck, and to which may be attached apparatus for sawing, or any other purpose.

On the Rhine, Saône, and other Continental rivers, floating Tide-Mills have been most successfully adopted; whilst in this country only two instances occur of their having been attempted, and these, owing to the want of simplicity in their arrangements, failed to produce any useful effect.

If we can rely on the correctness of the above table—which is said to be the result of actual experiment with the 7 feet wheel—there can be no doubt but that, at no very distant period, the public will avail itself largely of this cheap and enduring motive power, especially in the vicinity of the more rapid rivers, such as the Thames, Mersey, Severn, Humber, Tyne, &c.

FRIBOURG.—FROM AN ORIGINAL SKETCH.

SWITZERLAND.

The civil war progresses slowly. Hostilities tend towards Lucerne, the great stronghold of the Sonderbund. The position of that city and its capacity for defence may be understood from the following description:—On the north, it is commanded by hills from which the city may be cannonaded. On the west it is washed by the Reuss, a deep and rapid river, which forms its best protection; and on the south the city is covered by the lake. It is most vulnerable on the east, where, probably, the attack will be made. There the means of defence are completely deficient. The churchyard wall and a few houses afford a slight protection. Lucerne is completely commanded, both on the east and on the north, by hills easily accessible, and from which a heavy fire may be directed against the town. The men of Lucerne have erected batteries on those heights, but the decisive struggle will most probably take place nearer the city. If the General of the Sonderbund cannot defend the heights he is lost. If he succeed in maintaining himself there, or if he repulse General Dufour, the check experienced at Fribourg will be more than balanced. The frontiers of the Canton, however, have not yet been crossed by the Federal troops, and the General-in-Chief was determined not to attack the city until he had assembled his entire force, consisting of 70,000 men, with 180 pieces of artillery.

Letters from Berne state that all the public establishments of Fribourg, the school of the Jesuits, and the convents, had been converted into barracks for the accommodation of the troops of the fourteen battalions, who took possession of the city. A provisional Government, elected by the people, was installed on the 15th, previous to the arrival of federal commissaries. Colonel Maillardoz, Commander-in-Chief of the Fribourg troops, and most of the members of the last Council of State, had absconded. General Dufour arrived at Berne on the 15th and departed on the following morning at six o'clock, for Argau, where his presence was necessary to commence the military operations against Lucerne. Colonel Ochsenbein also returned to Berne on the 15th, with the division of reserve, and marched on the next day to Sumiswald and Langenthal. The brigade of Frei, 3,000 strong, belonging to the division of General Burkhardt, passed through Berne in the afternoon of the 16th, proceeding in the direction of Lucerne.

The provisional Government of Friburg was composed of Liberals, amongst whom were Messrs. Julien Schaller, Wicky, Fitel, Chatonney, Robadey, &c.

On reaching Fribourg, in the evening of the 15th, the federal representatives, Messrs. Stockmar, Reinert, and Grivat had a long conference with Colonel Rilliet, who commands the division of occupation. The greatest disorder and anarchy prevailed in the Canton wherever there were no federal troops. The disarmament of the Landsturm was far from being complete, and in certain districts that measure was likely to present serious difficulties. The former Government had prepared a proclamation, giving an account of its reasons for surrendering Fribourg, but that document not being signed by any of its members, no printer would take upon himself to publish it. The Government stated that it was determined on every sacrifice rather than yield, if those to whom it had confided the defence of the country had not declared all resistance impossible. The effective force of the federal army amounted to 94,000 men, and consisted of 102 battalions of infantry, 45 companies of carabiniers, 27 companies of cavalry, 53 batteries of artillery (212 pieces), 6 companies of sappers, and 6 companies of pontoniers

The Berne Gazette of the 18th inst. contains the following, under date Fribourg, 16th —

"In the German districts of the Canton, the Landsturm have again assembled to recommence hostilities, particularly near Uberstorf. The Landsturm is greatly irritated against the last Government, which it accuses of treachery. The Radicals, who constitute but one-tenth of the population of Fribourg, are now masters of the city. A clergyman, who fired upon the federal troops, was taken prisoner and immediately shot. Two soldiers of Vaud having been stabbed in their beds, Colonel Rilliet intended to declare the place in a state of siege." All strangers had been expelled, together with the Jesuits, the Ligorians, and the members of the Congregation of Mary.

The Journal des Débats gives lamentable details of the pillage of private houses, churches, &c., &c., and the robbery of the silver sacred vessels and utensils of the latter. All the attachés of the French legation left Berne for Bâle on the 7th inst., and M. Bois-le-Comte (the French Minister) himself was to depart for that city in the evening. The motive of the determination adopted by the French Minister, was the refusal of a passport he had demanded for his Second Secretary, M. de Banneville, whom he intended to send to Lucerne for the protection of French interests.

Advices from Berne to the 20th, state that the operations against Lucerne had commenced, and that several districts of that Canton adjoining Argau had been occupied by the Federal Troops. A courier had reached Berne the night before, announcing that the men of Uri, to the number of 1500, reinforced by 2000 Valaisians, had advanced on the 17th towards Airolo, in the Canton of Ticino and, after a sanguinary engagement, succeeded in taking possession of that town. The battalion of Cazellini, and a company of Carabiniers, who formed its garrison, retreated on Faido, and probably on Bellinzona, where Colonel Lurini was concentrating his forces.

THE ENGRAVINGS.

The first Illustration is from a sketch recently taken by Mr. Charles Vacher. It shows the interior of Fribourg, from the street or rather steps, leading from the Grande Place of the upper, down to the lower, Town. From this point you obtain the best notion of the peculiar situation of Fribourg, with the river Saane at the bottom, and a few of the old watch-towers on the distant hills.

The second of our Illustrations is a Panoramic View of Lucerne, environed with beautiful scenery, on the borders of the finest and most interesting of the Swiss lakes, between the giants Pilatus and Righi, and in sight of the snowy Alps o Schwytz and Engelberg. The town is still surrounded by a very picturesque circle of feudal watch-towers, and is walled in on the land side: but its chief peculiarity is the number and length of its bridges.

PANORAMA OF LUCERNE.

OPENING OF THE PARIS AND BOULOGNE RAILWAY.

(From our own Correspondent.)

THE AMIENS STATION.

PUBLIC opening of the Railroad from Abbeville to Neufchatel took place on Monday last. There was no ceremonial upon the occasion; but some of the Directors and their friends visited the line several times last week. I have been over the whole of the line, and have had an opportunity of hearing the opinion of practical men in favour of its general condition. You are aware that Neufchatel is about seven miles from Boulogne; and it was hoped that the whole line, from Paris to Boulogne, would have been finished by the commencement of the next year. This, however, is impossible, notwithstanding the great exertions used by those who have the management of the works. The delay is caused by the difficulties attendant on the completion of a tunnel through the forest of Hardelot. This tunnel promises to afford a magnificent specimen of English industry and genius. Although only about 185 metres, or 200 English yards, in length, this work has required very greatattention for some time past. The territory, composed principally of light sand, presents what are popularly called "engineering difficulties" of the most formidable description; but, under the able superintendence of Mr. Mackenzie, very great progress has been made with the labour. I only speak the opinion of all scientific men who have seen it, when I pronounce it to be a work requiring no ordinary care, skill, and perseverance. The drawings made of the progress of the works, prove this. They show that great taste has been displayed, in addition to the other requisites.

I need hardly tell you that the greatest anxiety exists for the completion of the line to Boulogne, and this desire has induced rather too eager and sanguine an expectation as to the time when such a desirable consummation can be effected. Such are the difficulties connected with the tunnel, that, from all I can learn, those who have the best means of judging, do not think it can be finished before April or May. The completion of this work alone causes the delay; for the rails have been nearly laid down as far as Boulogne itself, where the station is nearly completed. I passed over the line from Boulogne to the tunnel a few mornings ago, on my way to the station at Neufchatel, previous to a visit to the line between Abbeville and Paris. The exceptions to which I allude comprise a very small space of ground; and if the tunnel were finished, the works might be completed, perhaps, in a week. I may mention that when Mr. Blount, accompanied by the Government engineer, tried the line on the part of the Directors, the locomotive sometimes went at the speed of about forty miles an hour

It will no doubt be interesting to English travellers to know that, from the present period, there will be three trains a day from Neufchatel to Paris—viz., at eight in the morning, a quarter to three in the afternoon, and nine in the evening. From Paris to Neufchatel the trains are appointed to start at eight in the morning, and one and seven in the afternoon. Omnibuses have been appointed to take passengers from Boulogne to the Neufchatel station, for which the charge is two francs. The French are very fond of odd money, and of course have adopted the principle in this instance. Thus, the charge for the first class from Boulogne to Abbeville will be 2*5f.* 65*c.*; second class ditto, 20*f.* 5*c.* (the centime being the hundredth part of the franc); third class ditto, 14*f.* 90*c.* In English money, the fare for the first class is about a pound sterling.

The chief stations between Neufchatel and Abbeville are Etaples, Rue, and Noyelle. The distance from Abbeville to Boulogne is reckoned at forty kilometres, or twenty leagues. It is about fifty English miles.

At Etaples a handsome bridge has been erected, and, from its peculiar construction, all sorts of vague reports have been at times circulated. Only last week a story was generally believed at Boulogne that it had fallen in, with several carriages, to the destruction of several of the Directors. The truth is, that the bridge is as beautiful in appearance as it is solid in construction. It has been tested with immense weights during the last fortnight, and stood the test most satisfactorily. This fine structure is composed of fifteen arches, and is upwards of 280 metres in length. (A metre is a third more than an English yard.) The injury done by the accident which actually occurred has been entirely repaired.

The Rue station is reached from Etaples by the railroad in about twenty minutes. Rue dates from a very early period, and was formerly a town of some importance. The chief trade is in dyeing, which is carried on to some extent. The Church, as we have already stated, is a very ancient one, and presents some points of high interest to the artist and antiquary. Hitherto, Rue has been but little known; but the opening of the Railway will, no doubt, attract attention to it. A large sum has been expended by the French Government on the Church, and it is intended to place it in a complete state of restoration. The best preserved and finer portions of this edifice are of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries; but some of the interior is of a much earlier date—probably of the time of its foundation, viz., 1001.

Neufchatel, the station nearest to Boulogne, is a small village, situated in a richly-wooded hollow. It has no historical interest; at least, I can find no mention of it in any of the works which treat of the Department du Nord or of the Somme. The Church comprises architecture of various dates, and the bell-tower is picturesque, and somewhat peculiar in construction.

Le Crotoy was a town of some importance at the time of the Battle of Crecy Edward the Third, on his march to that field, besieged and took by assault the town and castle, destroying more than four thousand of the garrison. One hundred years afterwards, the castle must still have been a place of strength, as Jeanne d'Arc was a prisoner there in 1431.

Le Crotoy is now rather a poor village, and the visitor must search carefully among the sand-hills in which the houses or huts are half hidden, to find a few low walls, the only remains of this once strong castle. The Church is of great age, and contains many objects which render it worth a visit.

There are eighteen stations between Amiens and Paris. From Amiens to Abbeville the number of stations is six.

Arrangements, I understand, will be made for more rapid travelling, when the line from Paris to Boulogne is entirely finished. At the present period, the time occupied between Neufchatel and Abbeville is about two hours, and from Abbeville to Paris, six hours, including a stoppage of about two hours at Amiens, and ten minutes at Creil, between Amiens and Paris.

The French take great interest in their railways, and very naturally, as you will understand when I tell you that upwards of three millions sterling have been circulated through English agency in those undertakings. A great many English (or rather Irish) are employed with the French workmen, but, with the exception of some trifling disputes occasionally, they act together very harmoniously.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

BIRMINGHAM AND OXFORD.—The "Committee of Safety" of the Birmingham and Oxford line has shelved itself from any further sittings, the legal proceedings instituted under its authority being in such a train as to render any further superintendence on its part unnecessary.

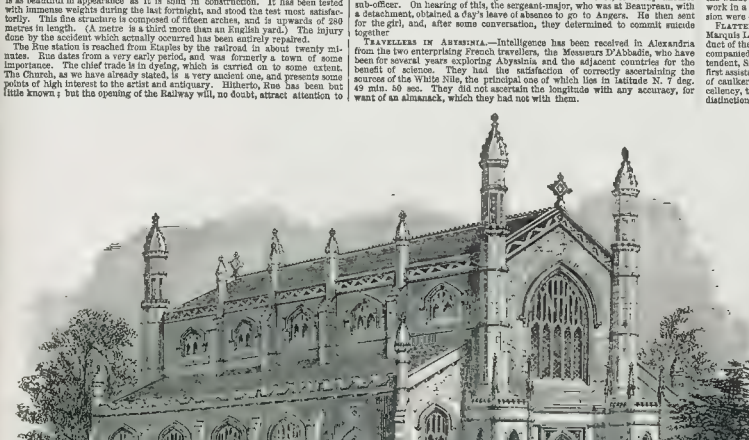
QUICK TRAVELLING.—A party of gentlemen, amongst whom was Mr. Mac Gregor, the chairman of the South Eastern Railway, started from Paris on Saturday, and reached London in 12 hours and 50 minutes. The journey from Paris to Boulogne occupied 4 hours 59 minutes; from Boulogne to Folkestone, 1 hour and 55 minutes; and from Folkestone to London 2 hours and 5 minutes. There was no effort in accomplishing this; the train from Paris to Amiens was a slow train, and stopped at every station.

DUNSTABLE RAILWAY.—The Government inspector has just reported on the fitness of this line for public traffic, but, owing to the numerous alterations which the opening of the Trent Valley renders necessary in the entire working of the North-Western system, the Dunstable line is not likely to be publicly opened until January. It is a short line of seven miles, diverges out of the main route at Leighton, a distance of 40 miles, and has cost 130,000*l.* There is no engineering of difficulty, the steepest gradient being 1 in 173. The estimated net profit on the probable traffic is about 2600*l.* per annum, or equal to 5 per cent.

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.—A Parliamentary book has been issued, containing the evidence given before the Select Committee of the House of Commons, appointed to enquire into the nature of the Ecclesiastical Commission. The Committee in their report state, that they have heard evidence on the two points submitted to them,—namely, as to the composition and management of the Commission, and they recommend that in the next (the present) session, the subject should be continued

A FEW days ago the bodies of a sergeant-major of the regiment stationed at Angers, in France, and of a young girl, the daughter of one of the cantonniers, were found tied together in the river Maine, near the rock of the Beaumette. The young girl had had a child by the sergeant-major; but, pressed by her mother, she had consented, during the absence of her lover, to marry another sub-officer. On hearing of this, the sergeant-major, who was at Beaupreau, with a detachment, obtained a day's leave of absence to go to Angers. He then sent for the girl, and, after some conversation, they determined to commit suicide together

TRAVELLERS IN ABYSSINIA.—Intelligence has been received in Alexandria from the two enterprising French travellers, the Messieurs D'Abbadie, who have been for several years exploring Abyssinia and the adjacent countries for the benefit of science. They had the satisfaction of correctly ascertaining the sources of the White Nile, the principal one of which lies in latitude N. 7 deg. 49 min. 50 sec. They did not ascertain the longitude with any accuracy, for want of an almanack, which they had not with them.



NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH AT KENTISH TOWN.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. II.

MR. R. A. S. ADAIR, M.P.

MR. ROBERT ALEXANDER SHAFTO ADAIR is the new member for the borough of Cambridge. He is the eldest son of Sir Robert Shafto Adair, of Flixton Hall, Norfolk. His brother, Mr. Hugh Edward Adair, sits for Ipswich. Mr. Shafto Adair contested East Suffolk in 1841 and 1843, but without success: like the Mover of the Address, he is a new member. His opinions ally him to the Liberal party: he is opposed to the endowment of the Catholic clergy.

MR. SHAFTO ADAIR, M.P. FOR CAMBRIDGE.

Mr. Adair seconded the Address in the House of Commons. Neither the Mover nor the Seconder have much opportunity for display. From the prescribed character of the speeches they have to deliver, it is scarcely possible to fail, and so far, it is a favourable occasion for a début on the political stage; but the same cause represses anything like originality or boldness of treatment, and a very striking speech either in moving or seconding the Address, is scarcely on record.

OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF THE ROMAN CATHOLIC HIERARCHY.—A circular has been issued from Downing-street, instructing the authorities in the Colonies to address the Roman Catholic Prelates in such Colonies by the title to which their rank in their own church may appear to give them a just claim, officially styling them "your Grace" or "your Lordship," as the case may be. As, however, Parliament, in the Charitable Bequests Act, on which this instruction is founded, has, for obvious reasons, not sanctioned this assumption by the Prelates of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland of titles derived from the sees which they hold, a similar rule is to be observed in the Colonies, so that the Roman Catholic Prelate in New South Wales will merely be addressed as the Most Reverend Archbishop Polding, and in Van Diemen's Land as the Right Reverend Bishop Wilson.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—The Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury have caused Mr. Parker, one of their Lordships' secretaries, to transmit to the Commissioners of Customs, for their information and the guidance of the several officers and departments under their control, an Order in Council constituting the town and port of Portland, in the district of Melbourne, New South Wales, to be a free warehousing port.

A STRANGE FARCEL.—On Saturday last, one of the porters at the Castle Station of the Lancaster and Carlisle Railway discovered, in the carriage of a train just arrived from the north, a child about four years old, labelled "To be left at Leeland Fee." The child was removed to the workhouse. In the evening, however, a man, who turned out to be the father, made inquiries respecting it: he was a coachmaker on tramp, and hearing, while at Kendal, of the probability of meeting with work at Lancaster, he dispatched the child thither per railway, while he performed the journey on foot.

SHOCK OF AN EARTHQUAKE IN SOUTH WALES.—On Saturday accounts were received from Llandaff, Cardiff, Newport, Risca, and other towns in South Wales, of two very violent shocks of earthquake being experienced in that part of the Principality. The buildings were sensibly shaken, and in numerous instances the windows rattled to an alarming extent. At Risca, the colliers ran from their work in a painful state of excitement. At Llandaff also the noise and concussion were considerable.

FLATTERING MARKS OF DISTINCTION.—The Emperor of Brazil, through the Marquis Lisboa, Ambassador, has communicated his high satisfaction at the conduct of the officers superintending the repairs of the Constitucao, at this yard, accompanied with Orders of Knighthood to Sir John West; the admiral superintendent, Sir S. Pym; W Edye, Esq., master shipwright; Thomas Spiller, Esq., first assistant, Mr. Fincham, foreman of shipwrights; and Mr. Darling, foreman of caulkers. We understand the several diplomas have been returned to his Excellency, the rules of our service not admitting civilians to receive such foreign distinctions.—Plymouth Times.

KENTISH TOWN NEW CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

THE erection of this edifice, for the Nonconformists resident in Kentish Town and its neighbourhood, has been required by the rapidly-increasing population of the district. The first stone of the building was laid on Monday, by Thomas Spalding, Esq., of Kentish Town, in the presence of several Ministers, and the numerous friends interested in the good work; being the church and congregation under the pastoral care of the Rev. W. Forster, who addressed the assembled company on Monday, previous to the ceremony of laying the stone; and at its close, an appropriate address was delivered by the Rev. John Burnet, of Camberwell.

The site of the new edifice is a plot of ground opposite Bartholomew-place. It has been designed by Messrs. Hodge and Butler, architects, Beaufort-buildings, Strand. The plan is a parallelogram, 100 feet by 60 feet; divided into nave and aisles, vestries, and lobbies; and will accommodate seven hundred persons, in carved oak pewing, with reclining backs. There will, also, be an organ-gallery, with sittings for two hundred children and twenty choristers, approached by circular fire-proof stairs.

The style selected by the architects is that of the fifteenth century, with great attention to detail and effect. The nave and aisles, in plan, are divided by five octagonal piers and lofty arches, which carry the clerestory walls, supporting an elegant open oak roof, peculiar to the style. The windows are richly tracerried; they include a splendid wheel window, in the east end, fifteen feet in diameter. The whole will be filled with stained glass, of elegant design, by Chance, Brothers, of Birmingham.

The exterior will be of Kentish rag-stone, in random courses, with Bath-stone dressings. The contract has been taken by Mr. Trego, of Coleman-street, who, we understand, is executing his work very much to the satisfaction of the Building Committee; so as to render ample justice to the architects' highly meritorious design.

"S. H. D." By "esoteric" is meant any species of allusion or description which can only be well understood by a certain clique of persons. Perhaps, in its broadest sense, the word "technical" comes nearest to it in meaning; but this does not altogether define it. In every family you will find a number of "esoteric" words, used amongst the various members, which, although expressive and forcible to them, cannot be appreciated out of their circle. Every profession or trade has its "esoteric" conversation. If you meet a party of persons, laughing loudly at what you can see no humour in, it is charitable to suppose that their jokes are "esoteric;" that they connect various words and allusions with circumstances in their own minds, which render droll what would otherwise be dull or unintelligible. It is one of the most useful of modern words

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1847.

OUR suggestion that the public would gain by the large infusion of men of business into the present Parliament, has been supported by an opinion from a good authority—Mr. Cobden. In his speech at the meeting called to receive the resignation of Mr. C. Villiers, of the seat for Lancashire, (his second return), Mr. Cobden said, what the country required was practical men who would apply to public affairs the same principles they apply to their own business. He intimated that in a time of embarrassment, the soundest policy was retrenchment; if this denotes any intention on his part to take the economical department out of the hands of Mr. Hume and Mr. Williams, we may prepare for a powerful review of the mode in which our revenues are expended. At present the Estimates are nibbled at, the smacking items, perhaps of a few thousands, when millions may be going another way. For instance, it will have cost us something like a million to keep the rotten Government of Portugal in office. In points like these, we might certainly hold our hands with advantage; there is not a disturbance in any part of the world but we are drawn into it, and eventually have to pay the greater portion of the reckoning. The expenditure of the Army and Navy, too, notwithstanding the great changes for the better that have taken place, are still, in many things, loose and unregulated. A case has come under our notice this week; the Admiralty has not yet learned that a frigate built to sail, will not do for a steam-vessel. They ordered the Amphion frigate to be converted into a steamer; and, after a twelvemonth's tinkering, and trying some patent valves, and screwing and unscrewing, the whole vessel turns out a total failure. It is stated that—

The waste of the public money in the case of the Amphion alone would suffice to build and equip a small river steamer, even allowing that her engines are not to be condemned. In the first place, there is the pay and provisions of her crew, which consists of 330 men, besides officers, during a period averaging for the whole of the crew, at least seven months. This cannot be much short of £3000 The interest on the capital embarked in her hull and machinery, during the twelve months she lay idle at Woolwich, the salaries of her officers, the extras in the engineers' accounts (for, of course, they could not be answerable for defects emanating from the constructor), the coals, tallow, oil, &c., wasted in her experimental trips, with other contingent expenses, will probably swell this amount to at least nine or ten thousand pounds, the whole of which is as hopeless and irrecoverably lost as if it had been dropped into the crater of Mount Vesuvius.

Nor is this a solitary instance: —

At the present moment the Myrmidon and the Trident lie at Woolwich, both undoubted sailiers, puzzling the Admiralty as to what is to be done with them; the one after a very short period of service, the other returned from a break down in the Mediterranean, and both new vessels.

It is in such things as these, the talent of men of business is needed; did any one ever hear of merchants making such miserable blunders? When private builders construct a vessel, they generally know whether it will sail or steam, or not. The Government are rather surprised than otherwise, when they succeed; and they have a mania for turning one class of vessels into another.

ERROR is so innate in man, that the statement of the proposition has passed into a proverb. Humanum est errare is, in fact, an axiom in all sublunary estimates and reckonings; and, while it is for us to accept the condition so ordained, in a proper Christian spirit, we should not, at the same time, unnecessarily aggravate this native proneness to wrong by heedlessness or negligence, upon occasions which peremptorily demand care, attention, and cautious judgment. There are few of the duties devolving upon Judges and Jurics, An instance in point has occurred very recently. A woman named Mary Ann Turford, was convicted at the Central Criminal Court, in October last of stealing a watch, and sentenced to six months' imprisonment; her innocence was clearly established on the recent trial of James William Ward (noticed in our Law Intelligence this week), who w s convicted and sentenced to transportation for the same offence; and now we learn that this ill-treated woman has been released from the House of Correction at Brixton, by order of the Secretary of State, her Majesty having been pleased to grant her a free pardon. It is impossible to believe that there has not been great remissness on the part of one or the other, or probably of both the authorities of the Judicial Tribunal, namely, the Judge and the Jury who decided this unfortunate case.

In the disposal of the ordinary business of our criminal courts it appears to us, the responsibility incurred by Judges and Jurors in dealing with so much human suffering and misery is not sufficiently felt by them.

They are vested for the time being with the most extensive powers that society confers upon men, and the sense of the accompanying responsibility should be commensurate. If it were so, lamentable instances of such injustice as that done to Mary Anne Turford would be rare indeed. It should be understood that in cases of that kind an investigation would be instituted to ascertain whether the injustice had been inflicted through needless haste or carelessness on the part of either or any of the occupants of the judgment seat—the Judge or the Jury—or whether it was an unavoidable mishap beyond the control of human ken; and in case of the former being established, the reparation due to the suffering party, and which should be largely made in either case, ought to be accorded at the expense of the blameable functionaries.

In the case of the Judge, the degradation consequent on the adoption of an arrangement or this kind would most probably effectually deter himself and his colleagues from any repetition of the offence; but should it not have the desired effect, a surer remedy, to which it is unnecessary to refer on this occasion, readily suggests itself.

We trust, at all events, that the poor woman Turford will have some reparation made to her.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR. We are happy to hear that the noble and learned Lord is considered better, but it is not expected that his Lordship will be able to resume his official duties for some days to come.

LORD STANLEY. The following graphic sketch is from the Times of Thursday :—

"Lord Stanley is a splendid relator of acts, but he is not to be trusted with an inference from them; he sees colours with eloquence on first principles, but when we come to their relative application he breaks down. He is just the man for a party that will not submit to be led by fair means. Give him his cue and he goes on. He masters the brief in his hands. Were we to judge from the power he exhibits in an occasional burst, we should take all he said implicitly for granted. If we drew an estimate of his statesmanship from the general character of his arguments, we should foreswear for ever so uncertain and treacherous a guide. He is a schoolboy developed to the most magnificent proportions."

THE TWO DOUBLE RETURNS.—At a meeting held at Manchester, on Monday evening, it was announced that Mr. Cobden had elected to sit as representative of the West Riding of Yorkshire; and that Mr. C. Villiers, with many expressions of grateful acknowledgment to the electors of South Lancashire, declined to desert his former constituents of Wolverhampton. Writs will accordingly be issued for new elections for South Lancashire and Stockport.

THE Observer states that Lord George Bentinck and Mr. Disraeli, with the immediate friends of both the hon. Members, are resolved to vote for the abolition of the remaining disabilities of the Jews.

THE WEATHER.

THE weather during the past week has been unsettled, the sky has been a good deal clouded, the air has been misty or foggy, and nearly saturated with moisture. The wind has been generally light, and there have been considerable changes of temperature.

CHURCH, UNIVERSITIES, &c.

OXFORD. Nov. 23.

The Ashmolean Society held its second meeting for the term on Monday evening. The Rev. R. Greswell in the chair.

The minutes of the last meeting having been read, several presents to the society were announced.

On the table was placed an earthen vessel, found on making a well in the parish of St. Mary Magdalen, in this city, at the bottom of a stone wall, the remains of the foundation of Crenford-hall, at the depth of about eighteen feet; presented by John Richard Carr; the vessel was probably used as a watering-pot.

Also a curious substance, apparently of iron and sand, from Norfolk, presented by Mr. Duncan.

Professor Powell exhibited some diagrams to illustrate his observations on the "Analysis and Synthesis of Light." What was so fully made out by Newton in its general features has yet been left to be followed out in many of its details Colour and refrangibility were accurately connected by Newton, only in the sense that colour marks a particular position in the spectrum. The sensation of colour produced by a particular ray is wholly dependent on physiological causes, and varies with different individuals, and under different conditions. Hence, the true meaning of Newton is not at variance with the experiments of Sir David Brewster. According to that philosopher's experiments, the analysis of light by absorption gives rays of a certain refrangibility with entirely different colours. His results have been directly controverted by Mr. Airy; but the conditions of the two experiments are essentially different, the latter viewing the spectrum thrown on a screen, the former receiving it directly on the eye, through a coloured medium; but in this case the eye receives at the same time much extraneous light coloured by the medium which mixes with the other, and must interfere with the effect. Newton conceived that the spectrum would be reduced to a number of distinct coloured spaces, separated by intervals, if the aperture, or origin of light, were made small enough; this he never fully verified.

Mr. Bosley exhibited three drawings of the late splendid appearance of the aurora of October 24, as it was observed by him at three different periods of the evening, and compared the appearances as seen at Paris and London. The next meeting will be on Monday, December 7.

CONVOCATION. The Convocation met on Wednesday, and the Address sent down from the Upper House was amended in one or two not unimportant particulars. It will be found to imply an earnest desire that Convocation may be permitted to meet for the consideration of the best interests of the Church; an expression of thanks to her Majesty for giving the Roya. Assent to the measure for securing the separate existences of the Sees of St. Asaph and Bangor; and a prayer that the Episcopate may be made to bear proportion to the wants of the Church, and the rapid growth of the population. The question of Dr Hampden's appointment was mooted, and a proposition made for petitioning her Majesty to delay a confirmation till after Dr. Hampden's case (which he had been subjected to a careful examination by the proper authorities. Although there was a very general condemnation of the appointment, yet, as many doubted whether it properly came within the sphere of Convocation to act upon it, the proposition itself was negatived

CONVOCATION OF THE CLERGY AT YORK. The Convocation of the Bishops, Archdeacons, and Proctors of the Clergy in the province of York was held in the Chapter House of the Cathedral, on Friday (last week). In consequence of the death of the Archbishop, a special writ had been issued by the Crown to the Rev. Canon Dixon, appointing him President of the Convocation, and he accordingly took the chair. Amongst the members of Convocation present, were the Dean of Ripon, the Archdeacon of York, the Archdeacon of the East Riding, the Archdeacon of Cleveland; the Archdeacon of Durham the Rev. Canon Hawkins, &c. The President having made some remarks, which were indistinctly heard, in reference to the presentation of an address to the Queen, Archdeacon Wilberforce said that the address alluded to was in his hands for the purpose of moving its adoption by that house. He did so with great pleasure, especially as it embraced the feelings of their recently deceased Archbishop. It expressed the confidence of the clergy in the Queen's intentions for the benefit of the Church, their satisfaction at the addition of another bishopric to this province, their determination to do all they could in behalf of the great cause of national education, and of their sense of the importance of holy and religious lives in those who are ministers of the altar. The President here interrupted the Very Rev. Gentleman, and prorogued the Convocation.

PLACE OF HEBREW PROFESSORSHIP. On Thursday night, Lord Robertson pronounced interim interdict against Professor M'Donald, who was, therefore, unable to deliver his introductory discourse. The Senatus Academicus have held a meeting, to resolve upon the steps proper for them to adopt in case Professor M'Donal commenced to occupy the Hebrew chair.

EDINBURGH HEBREW CHAIR.—The new Professor was to have delivered his introductory discourse on Friday se'nnight, but, on Thursday evening, the Lord Ordinary issued an interdict against his doing so. The Scotch Episcopal Church have appointed a Hebrew Lecturer for their students, so that all the Scotch Universities have now got Oriental preceptors of their own nomination

ON Thursday, the 18th instant, the electors of the Radcliffe Travelling Fellowships met at the House of Lords, and appointed James Claudius Paxton, M.B. of Brasenose College, to be one of the Fellows on that Foundation.

ON the return of Mr. WAKLEY, M.P. for South Shields, at the last election, his supporters pledged themselves to pay the expenses of the petition at the door of the House of Commons not one penny the poorer for his election. Having some time since discharged the cost of the contest, his election committee, on Thursday se'nnight, presented the hon. Member with a first-class ticket for London, and money to pay his cab-hire from the railway station to St. Stephen's!

SALE OF THE LATE BARON VERSTOLK'S COLLECTION OF REMBRANDT'S ETCHINGS. We are happy to explain that the details of the interesting sale (in our Journal of November 13, page 314) are incorrectly stated, both as regards prices and description. Neither was almost the whole of the collection purchased for the British Museum, as the report in question states: seven of the most important prints were, however, purchased for that establishment, by Messrs. Smith, of Lisle-street, who bought, also, nearly all the principal prints.

IMPORTANT TO HOP PLANTERS.—It is well that those who intend to grub parts of their plantations should be aware that by the 42d section of the Tithe Act, hops grubbed before the 31st day of December, 1847, will not be liable to the extraordinary rent charge of £3 per acre, but hops grubbed in the spring of 1848 will be liable to the charge for that year.

DEATH OF A CELEBRATED CHARACTER.—On Wednesday Mr. PAYNE held an inquest at the East India Arms Tavern, in question states: seven of the most important prints were, however, purchased for that establishment, by Messrs. Smith, of Lisle-street, who bought, also, nearly all the principal prints.

COURT AND HAUT TON.

THE COURT AT WINDSOR.

On Saturday, his Royal Highness the Prince Consort, attended by the Hon Captain Gordon, rode to the covers between Bishopsgate and the Norfolk Farm. His Royal Highness returned to the Castle at two o'clock. The afternoon being damp and foggy, her Majesty and the Prince did not leave the Castle again.

Sunday afternoon the bands of both regiments were in attendance on the parterre, and her Majesty and the Prince Consort, with the Princess Royal and the Princess Alice Mand, walked for some time on the Eastern Terrace, attended by the Marchioness of Douro, Lord Alfred Paget, the Earl of Listowel, and the other Ladies and Gentlemen of the Court. After promenading several times along the terrace, her Majesty and the Royal Family, with their attendants, descended the grand flight of steps into the parterre, from whence they passed through the canopy into the Home Park, and took the path leading towards Adelaide Lodge; but a dense fog, with symptoms of rain, coming on, they returned to the Castle, just as the bands had concluded the National Anthem, and the public were leaving the parterre. Whilst her Majesty was out walking with the Prince and the Royal children, Lord John Russell arrived at the Castle, and was honoured with an invitation to the Royal table this evening. This day being the seventh anniversary of the birth of the Princess Royal, the bells of the Churches were rung during the morning in celebration of the event, and Royal salutes were fired at Fort Belvidere, near Virginia Water, and from the Corporation grounds in the Bachelors' Acre. A large number of costly presents were received at the Castle from the various members of the Royal Family, to be presented to the Princess Royal on her birthday

The Queen held a Court and Privy Council, at one o'clock on Monday, at Windsor Castle. The Council was attended by his Royal Highness Prince Albert, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord John Russell, Sir George Grey, Viscount Palmerston, Earl Grey, the Earl of Auckland, Sir John Hobhouse, Viscount Morpeth, Earl Spencer, Lord Chamberlain, and the Duke of Norfolk.

At the Council, Mr. Richard More O'Ferrall was, by command of the Queen, introduced, and was sworn of her Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council. The right hon. gentleman then kissed hands of office.

The Queen's Speech, which was delivered in Parliament on Tuesday, was arranged and agreed upon.

A Charter of Incorporation was granted to Wakefield. The Hon. William Bathurst was the Clerk of the Council in Waiting.

At the Court, the Marquis of Normanby, her Majesty's late Ambassador to his Majesty the King of the French, was graciously received by the Queen at an audience, by Viscount Palmerston, G.C.B., her Majesty's principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs.

After the Privy Council, a déjeuner was served in the Castle to all the noblemen and gentlemen present at the Council, who took their departure at a quarter before three o'clock.

The Royal dinner party at the Castle included her Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent, the Lady in Waiting of the Duchess of Kent, the Baroness de Speth, and Sir George Couper.

DEPARTURE OF THE COURT FOR OSBORNE.

The Queen and Prince Albert, accompanied by their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, the Princess Alice, and the Princess Helena, left the Castle at a quarter past nine o'clock on Tuesday morning for the Queen's marine residence, Osborne, Isle of Wight.

The Royal suite consisted of the Marchioness of Douro, Lady in Waiting, a Maid of Honour in Waiting, Col. the Hon. C. B. Phipps, Major-General Bowles, Lord Alfred Paget, and Capt. the Hon. A. H. Gordon.

The august party occupied four carriages and four, and was escorted by a detachment of the Royal Regiment of Horse Guards, commanded by the Hon. Lewis O. Grant

Her Majesty the Queen, accompanied by the Prince Consort and a numerous suite, arrived in the Royal Clarence Victualling Establishment, Portsmouth, by special train, at about half past twelve o'clock. A guard of honour of the Royal Marine Corps was drawn up on the left of the point of arrival, to pay the usual tribute to the Sovereign's presence; and all the ships of war under the command of Admiral Ogle dressed ship and manned yards.

On the passage through Spithead, the platform guns were fired, as also at Monkton Mill and Royal salutes were also fired by the 84-gun ship Asia, and the troop ship Belleisle.

The Royal yacht entered the harbour of Cowes about half-past one, when the Royal Yacht Squadron battery, and the guns of Cowes Castle, thundered forth their fiery welcome, and the Royal cortège landed at the private pier in a few moments afterwards, and left for the new palace at Osborne in a char-a-banc and three carriages and pairs. On entering the new marine domain, the Royal standard was instantly hoisted from the summit of the great tower.

Her Majesty looked exceedingly well and pleased, as did his Royal Highness Prince Albert and the Royal Family. Her Majesty wore a black silk dress, trimmed with crape; black velvet bonnet, and a Scotch small check-patterned woollen shawl, black and white. Prince Albert wore a military cloak

On Wednesday morning her Majesty and Prince Albert took their usual early walk. The Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice, went in a carriage to the sea beach during the forenoon. The Earl Spencer, Lord Chamberlain, arrived at Osborne from town, and had an audience of the Queen. The stay of the Court at the Isle of Wight is expected to exceed a week

His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, attended by Major Stephens, left town on Wednesday, to honour Mr. Sloane Stanley with a visit at his seat, Paultons, Hants. Her Royal Highness the Duchess of Cambridge visited her Royal Highness the Duchess of Gloucester in the course of the day at Gloucester House.

His Royal Highness the Duchess of Kent will remain at Frogmore House during her Majesty's sojourn at the Isle of Wight.

The Marquis and Marchioness of Normanby left Paris on Saturday, for London. His Excellency's absence will extend to the middle of December, in order to take his seat in the New Parliament. Colonel William Hervey remains Chargé d'Affaires during the absence of Lord Normanby.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Right Hon. Richard More O'Ferrall, M.P., is expected to embark in her Majesty's steam-sloop Oberon, on Monday next, for conveyance to the seat of his civil government at Malta.

ADMIRAL Sir John West, K.C.B., the Commander-in-Chief at Plymouth, has stopped the transmission of letters to ships through his office.

REAR-ADMIRAL Philpps Hornby, C.B., the newly-appointed successor to Rear-Admiral Sir George Seymour, Commander-in-Chief in the Pacific, left town on Monday afternoon for Portsmouth, and hoisted his flag (blue) at the mizen of the Asia, 84, Captain E. P. Stopford, at Spithead, on Tuesday. The gallant Admiral put to sea the latter end of this week, for the seat of his command.

HYDROGRAPHIC OFFICE, Nov. 5.—Notice has been received from her Majesty's Consul at Lisbon, that on the 1st of the present month, a fixed red light would be exhibited from the Customs Station-house, at the Fort of San Succesco, in the Tagus, to serve as a leading light for clearing the shoal spit, Belem Castle

It is said that a battalion of the Guards is to be held in readiness to proceed to the Northern district, in the event of an additional number of troops being required in that part of England.

It is intended for the future to keep a permanent naval force at New Zealand. It will consist of one frigate, one sloop of war, and a steam-sloop. Orders have been sent out to form a naval depôt at Auckland, and such stores and provisions as cannot be procured at that colony will be sent out from England.

A MERCHANT of Paris, named Singer, lately bequeathed an inscription of rente of 300*l.* to found a prize of that amount, to be given annually to the sailor of the Royal navy who should best deserve a reward for good conduct in the course of service. The Minister of Marine has just decided that a special commission is to be appointed every year, to decide on the claims of the respective candidates, who must have served five years at least SOCIETY OF ARTS.—The third ordinary meeting of the Society of Arts was held on Wednesday evening at the house of the Society, in the Adelphi. The subject of discussion was the important one of communication between the guard and driver of a railway train, of which five different schemes were submitted to the society. That of Messrs. Brett and Little, the electric telegraph principle, and Mr. Dutton's acoustic communication, attracted the greatest attention, and were approved of for ingenuity and efficiency; the chief characteristic of the former being its power of speaking to the guard at both ends of the latter its propagating sound along a tube and finally through a whistle.

THE LANCASHIRE BELL-RINGERS.—Our Paris Correspondent informs us that the gentlemen who some time ago, under the appellation of the Lancashire Bell Ringers, excited some attention in London, have recently been performing in Paris, and that their performances have been very much to the taste of the Parisians. We gave portraits of these gentlemen at the time. They recently performed at a concert, at St. Cloud, before Louis Philippe, and his Majesty expressed to an English lady present his high gratification. They also gave a concert at the Salle Herz, which attracted all the fashion of Paris. The Parisians were delighted with the "Bine Bells of Scotland," transformed into "Les Cloches Bleues d'Ecosse."

THE passengers by the Marseilles diligence were dreadfully alarmed, a few days ago, on descending in the court-yard at the office at Toulouse, to see a monster, with brindling hair, and glaring eyes, rush among them, and utter strange cries. The monster was a hyena, which, pressed by hunger, had broken out of a cage on the top of the diligence. After making the four passengers quake dreadfully, for some little time, by causing them to believe that he was about to devour them, the animal rushed into a store containing provisions, and burst himself among them. The boldest of the passengers then plucked up sufficient courage to fasten the door. The next day, a gentleman claimed the hyena, which, on seeing him, licked his hands and feet, and otherwise caressed him like a dog. The gentleman was an officer of the army in Africa, and had succeeded in rendering the hyena perfectly tame. He led it, with a cord round its neck, to his hotel, and since then it has been frisking about the courtyard like a dog, and even allowing strangers to caress it.

THE following curious circumstance occurred at Cherbourg a few days ago. The town crier, beating his drum, went through the principal streets proclaiming the following:—"Notice to young girls! Four young carpenters who have arrived from Havre, and are employed at the military port (here their names and ages were given), being tired of living a single life, wish to get married." The ten names apply at M. Soin's, innkeeper, Rue de Chantier." Two of the would-be husbands accompanied the drummer, who, in showing them to the crowd, cried—"Here, young ladies, is a specimen of the young men who want to be married!"

NATIONAL SPORTS.

There is a tide in the affairs of man.—SHAKSPEARE.

Without stopping to go into the philosophy of the question—as to whether the bint be taken from the barnacles of nature and the like, the fact is the rushes of social life is ordered very much upon the principle of a horse in a mill. The Great Western train is an improvement in locomotion upon "the Derby Dilly"—no doubt as gas is better than the old oil lamps, which were wanted to struggle with the night, like fire-flies in a London fog. But these are the effects of science, which has little or nothing to do with the machinery of our homes and hotels. You are aware there is something wrong—something we can resolve shall be altered for the better—but it isn't—because the outlay of trouble exceeds the profit; or because you won't or can't—or don't do it. The Duke of ——, never cared for a tradesman of any sort, was the best judge in the house of his household. Now he had a maitre d'hotel without a fault in the world—unless, indeed I, you are so fastidious as to object against a taste he had for ecarte. Well, it so fell out that he had a run of ill luck and thereupon required to the ironmonger of the establishment with a request for a small discount—£100 at three months—say ten per cent. The tradesman pleaded that money had never before been so "tight" in his experience—that he was very sorry to refuse—that he should be most happy to oblige—in short the bill was not done. You should have seen the bowl of salmon his Grace had for dinner that night: like the retiring of the waters of the Flood, the tide of life ebbed from the

THE NEW PARLIAMENT.

INTRODUCTION OF MEMBERS OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS TO THE SPEAKER.

MR. HEYWOOD, M.P. FOR NORTH LANCASHIRE.

THE forms observed at the opening of a new Parliament, following, as they do, minutely and strictly, the precedents of former ages, preserve enough of costume and picturesqueness, independently of their political interest, to render them fit subjects for illustration. We have selected some of the chief incidents from those preliminary ceremonials which have occupied the past week—the Administration of the Oaths to the Peers and Commons, the Speaker at the Bar of the House of Lords receiving the Sovereign's Confirmation of his Election, the Introduction of New Members to the Speaker, and the last form, which brings the two branches of the Legislature together to hear the Address from the Throne.

For six years past the nation has hardly known a more eventful day than the 18th of November, 1847. That day witnessed the assemblage of a new Parliament, called together at a period of unusual difficulty—with Christmas, too, little more than a month distant. By noon, crowds of idle people had gathered around the entrances to the Legislative Chambers; and, precisely as the sonorous bells of the Abbey chimed forth the hour of one, the batch of upholsterers' men engaged in the usual sessional furbishing up of the House of Commons finished their task, and took their departure. Within half an hour after, the clerks were at their posts, the dressing out of the table of the House was completed, and the two familiar red boxes, in span new morocco covers, with the best batch of books in vermillion and gold binding, were deposited in their proper places by the busy messengers. Ere this was all arranged, the members had begun to arrive; and if a stranger lingered in the passage of the House, his ears would be gratified with a succession of comments, made by the assembled loungers, on them as they passed along. If he turned into the lobby, he would see the hearty welcome given by the doorkeepers of the honourable House to the old familiar faces, and the almost patronising shakings of the hand they bestowed on their particular favourites. And he could not fail to notice the cool survey these ancient officials took of the numerous strangers who, in virtue of the votes of their constituents, presented themselves for admittance.

Whilst all this was going on, every now-and-then some luckless stranger—an early, wa'ceful petitioner, maybe, who, anxious for the fulfilment of an election-promise of a berth in the Customs or Excise, was on the look-out for some new-fledged legislator—summoned up sufficient courage to address one or the other of these twin sentinels of the Legislative Chamber door-way, concerning the said member's whereabout. He gets for answer the quiet observation that they have not the pleasure of such a gentleman's acquaintance—this, by the way, somewhat pompously, and with a knowing wink at the grinning by-standers. Arrival after arrival is rapidly taking place, and the floor of the House is occupied with a somewhat varied company. Many stand there who, before another month has passed, will have had their little sway, and sunk into insignificance. The growing ambition, too, of more than one little mind, will, in that brief while, have experienced a salutary check. Chatty groups are formed in every direction; and many formal, and some few sincere, shakings of the hand take place between new friends and ancient foes. There stands the late Speaker, Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre, receiving the congratulations of all; and close to him, among the crowd of covered heads, we see the shining poll and good-tempered face of Sir Robert Harry Inglis. Lord G. Bentinck, seated for a moment or two—where he would, doubtless, desire to sit for the remainder of the Session, on the Ministerial Benches, is talking to Mr. Muntz, possibly about the "Birmingham inconvertible." He hastily leaves him, however, for a friendly and somewhat lengthy gossip with Lord John Russell. Mr. Disraeli is exchanging familiar nods and smiles with every one, always excepting his old hobby, Sir Robert Peel. W. J. Fox, Member for Oldham, sits wrapped in moody reverie, possibly surmising whether that eloquence which commanded the applause of thousands beneath the roof of Covent Garden Theatre will secure even a quiet hearing within the walls of St. Stephen's.

But now the hum of voices is stilled, and gradually the floor of the House is cleared, and the Members, one after another, take their seats. The Treasury Bench seems tolerably well filled, but its occupants are too far off to be individually recognised. Lord Morpeth, the Minister of the People, is certainly there, chatting with Lord Dundas. Attention is now awakened, to be, however, speedily satisfied. The Usher of the Black Rod is announced, with a message from the Lords; and he is soon seen walking slowly and stately up the body of the House, here and there standing still, and treating the Members to one of those formal bows which only your genuine officials are competent to make.

THE READING OF THE SPEECH.

PEERS TAKING THE OATHS.

His message delivered, the Clerk of the House leads the way to the Lords, followed by the greater portion of the members present.

PEERS TAKING THE OATHS.

Every Peer, before he can assume his seat in a new Parliament, has to take the oaths of allegiance, of supremacy, and abjuration. The form of procedure is as follows:—The House is assembled as for a debate, the Lord Chancellor, or his deputy, presiding on the woolsack; the Peer advances to the table, and presents his writ of summons to the new Parliament (a small slip of parchment) to the clerk, who immediately reads the oaths, which are repeated by the noble Lord, as in a Court of Justice. Several Peers may be sworn together, in the same manner as a Jury; some curious political combinations are presented by the groups thus formed; no order or precedence is observed, nor is there any distinction made between the spiritual and temporal Peers; the only exception to the usual form is that of Princes of the Blood Royal, who are sworn singly, though other Peers may be ready to take the oath at the same time. Each noble Lord, after he is sworn, signs the Roll of Parliament; and here we may explain that this is not a metaphorical term, like the "Scroll of Fame," the "Leaves of Destiny," and other imaginary documents. It is literally what its name implies, a "roll," or narrow strip of parchment, some yards in length, which lies on the table during the proceedings, often displaying a goodly stretch of sheepskin on the floor. It is only a few inches in width; the Peers sign their names under each other in one line down the centre. When rolled up, it forms a short, thick, compact mass, and is very fitly called the "Roll of Parliament."

The administering the oaths to a new Peer is a much more formal and stately proceeding. He is introduced by Garter-King at-Arms, in his full herald's dress; the Duke of Norfolk, Hereditary Grand Marshal, also in his robes; and by the Usher of the Black Rod. He is accompanied by two other Peers, who, as well as the noble Lord himself, wear the full robes of their rank. The Lord Chancellor or the Chairman cover to receive the party, which proceeds, with three obeisances to the Throne, up to the table. If the peerage is a new one, the letters patent of creation are presented to the clerk; if the title has fallen by succession to the present holder, he gives in his writ of summons. He then takes the oaths, after which he is escorted to his seat on the Dukes', Barons', or Bishops' bench, as the case may be, preceded by Garter King at Arms and the Black Rod. On taking his seat he covers, but immediately removes his hat, bows to the chair, and the ceremony is over. Two Peers have thus taken their seats in the new Parliament; Sir Richard Bulkeley Phillips Phillips, created Baron Milford, and the Earl of Strafford, promoted to that dignity from the rank of Baron, which he previously held.

COMMONS TAKING THE OATHS.

The form of administering the oaths to the Members of the House of Commons is more complicated than that of the House of Lords, there being more preliminaries to settle; and, from the greater number of Members, the oath is taken by larger parties at once. Each Member presents his return, and, after being sworn, gives in his qualification.

On Monday some amusement was created in the House by Sir R. Peel having forgot to bring his qualification with him; he was obliged to leave the House for the necessary document. The Speaker is the first to be sworn; he takes the oaths as soon as his election has been confirmed by the Sovereign; they are administered to him by the clerk, Mr. Ley, who, during the election of Speaker, acts as the moderator of the House of Commons. The counties are called alphabetically, and the members connected with them, both of boroughs and cities, as well as the knights of the shire, proceed to the table, and are sworn. We quote the following description of the first day's proceedings (Friday last) from the Times:—"The members for Bedfordshire were first called, and afterwards those for Buckinghamshire, Cambridgeshire, Chester, and Cornwall; whereupon so many of the knights of the shire, citizens and burgesses, from those counties as were present made a circle round the table and took the oaths. Among the group thus formed we observe, Mr. Goulburn, Mr. Disraeli, Mr. Law, Sir J. Jervis, the Hon. Mr. Campbell, Colonel Reid, Mr. J. Williams, and Mr. Wyld. The oaths of allegiance and supremacy, read aloud by the clerk, were, it was observed, repeated heartily and en rotunde by Mr. Goulburn and Mr. Law, while the other members at the table, each of whom was furnished with a copy of the oath, contented themselves with reading it mentally after the clerk, and kissing the book at the conclusion. The members at the table (with the exception of the two representatives for the University of Cambridge) then respectively delivered in their several qualifications, and made the requisite declaration that they were duly qualified, after which they signed the rolls of Parliament."

Two tables, covered with green baize, were brought into the House, in order to allow a larger number of members to be sworn at once.

INTRODUCTION OF MEMBERS TO THE SPEAKER.

This is a social custom rather than a legal formality. The old members of the House, the "familiar faces," on which the Speaker has looked through years of gaslight and controversy, of course need no introduction; they greet him as an old friend, and congratulate him on his re-election with a certain easy cordiality, wishing him health and patience, the latter especially, to perform the arduous duties of another Parliament. But the new members, as soon as they are sworn, are introduced to the Speaker by the Chief Clerk, who repeats their names in a loud voice, they advance to the chair and shake hands with the right hon. gentleman.

THE READING OF THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.

There is a good deal of old and picturesque ceremonial in the forms of a Royal Commission, whether it is appointed to give the assent of the Crown to a bill, or to deliver the Royal Speech, when the Sovereign, "for divers weighty reasons," does not think fit to do so in person. The Commissioners are generally five in number, of whom the Lord Chancellor is one, or when he cannot attend, the Lord President of the Council. The other Peers are selected from the supporters of the Ministry for the time being, and one or more of them may be of the Cabinet. They are named in the Commission as "Our trusty and well-beloved cousin and counsellor." At the hour appointed for the Commission, they enter the House in their full Peers' robes, and take their seats in front of the Throne, but not on the woolsack; the first Royal Commissioner—generally the Lord Chancellor—sits in the middle. On taking their seats, they cover; the Commission is then read at length by the Clerk at the table, and, as he reads each name, the Peer designated uncovers and bows. The reading of the Commission finished, the Chief Commissioner directs the Usher of the Black Rod to summon the House of Commons, and tell their message; the Commissioners and the House sit in silence. Presently, a rush, and the trampling of many feet are heard, and the Speaker, in his robes, with the Black Rod by his side, and followed by a greater or smaller number of members, according to the interest of the occasion, is seen advancing to the bar. It is etiquette that he should make three obeisances to the Lords Commissioners between the entrance and the bar, which are returned by their Lordships, who uncover, and bow simultaneously.

The present Speaker goes through these courtly forms, which are tinged with the manners of the past century rather than the present, with great ease and elegance of manner; his deportment has the perfect grace and self-possession of the accomplished gentleman.

As soon as the Commons have ranged themselves in standing order, the Chief Commissioner reads her Majesty's Speech; as soon as he completes it, he and the other Lords Commissioners uncover, and bow as before, while the Speaker and the members retire from the bar; their Lordships then rise, and bow with great profundity and decorum to each other, put on their hats, and retire from the House.

We have given an illustration of the Speaker and members at the bar. Though the Commons have much more space for their accommodation below the bar of the present House than in the old one, it is not sufficient for the number who occasionally attend: on Tuesday last it was densely crowded.

MOVERS OF THE ADDRESS.

MR. J. HEYWOOD, M.P.

ACCORDING to custom, the Address in the Commons, in reply to the Queen's Speech, was moved by a new member, Mr. James Heywood, who was returned for the Northern Division of Lancashire at the last election. He is the fifth son of the late Nathaniel Heywood, banker, of Manchester: he is brother to Sir Benjamin Heywood, who represented Lancashire in 1831. He was born in Liverpool in 1810. On leaving Cambridge, where he was Senior Optime, in 1833, he studied for, and was called to, the bar. He is a Liberal, of rather more than Whiggish tendencies, as he is in favour of the Ballot, and a further, though not unlimited, extension of the suffrage. He advocates a modification of the Navigation Laws and a reform of the Irish Church. We have given the hon. gentleman's speech in full in our Supplement. He was returned for the important district he represents without opposition.

THE EARL OF FARBOROUGH.

THE Address in the House of Lords was moved by the Earl of Farborough, who is the first instance of a peerage only succeeded to the title within the past year. His Lordship is much better known as the Mr. Worsley, of the House of Commons, where he frequently took part in the debates. In passing from the lower House to the upper the public frequently loses sight of men with whose names they have been made familiar through the columns of the daily press—the new dignity very often throws a veil over the old reputation. Charles Anderson Worsley Pelham is the second Earl of the title, to which he succeeded in 1846—he was born in 1809. His Lordship has never held any political office; but he takes an active interest in the extension of the lines of railway connected with the county of Lincoln and the midland districts.

The Seconder of the Address was to have been the Earl of Besborough, but he was unable to attend, and his substitute was Lord Elphinstone; his Lordship was evidently quite unprepared for the call upon him; he uttered but a few sentences, and they were not heard. Lord Stanley, who rose to deliver one of his sweeping and effective attacks, immediately the noble Seconder sat down, made rather an ill-natured allusion to this incident. Having termed the Address "the echo of a Speech singularly commonplace, and peculiarly barren in its character," he remarked, "It is incumbent upon me to say a few words in explanation of the impressions which have been made upon my mind by the Speech itself, and the expressions of my noble friends the Mover and Seconder of the reply. With regard, indeed, to the speech of the Seconder, I may pass that by, my Lords, without much observation. My noble friend, I am aware, upon what in another sphere is called 'the shortest possible notice,' took upon himself the part which he has done us the favour to play for this occasion."

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

THE ELECTOR OF HESSE.

WILLIAM II., Elector of Hesse, was born on the 28th July, 1777. He succeeded to the Electorate, on the death of his father, the 27th February, 1821. He had married, the 13th February, 1797, Augusta, daughter of Frederick William II., King of Prussia, by whom he had two daughters, one of whom is Reigning Duchess of Saxe Meinangen; an only son, Prince Frederick William, co-Regent of Hesse since 1831, and now his father's successor, as Elector. The late Elector, five months after the death of his Consort, espoused, in Morganatic wedlock, Emilia, Countess of Reichenbach-Lessonitz, who survives him. His Royal Highness died at Frankfort, on the 20th instant, after a few days' illness. The Duchess of Cambridge is of the family of, and first cousin to, the deceased Elector.

DR. DIBDIN.

The Rev. Thomas Frognall Dibdin, D.D., Rector of St. Mary's District Church, Bryanston-square, Vicar of Exning, Suffolk, and Chaplain in Ordinary to her Majesty, was the son, by his second marriage, of Captain Dibdin, a gallant officer in the British Navy, and brother of the famous Thomas Dibdin, the inimitable nautical poet. Dr. Dibdin mentions, in his own memoirs, that his father was the Tom Bowling of his uncle's writings. The Doctor himself lost his father when a child, and he was educated under the guardianship of his uncle. After passing through various preliminary studies he became a student of St. John's College, Cambridge. From his earliest schoolboy years, Thomas Frognall Dibdin displayed that taste for ancient books and antique lore, which formed the delight and ornament of his after life. On leaving College, he became a member of Lincoln's Inn, and, having married, settled with his family at Worcester as a special pleader. He, however, soon quitted the legal profession for the Church, and was ordained a clergyman in 1808. He then commenced that career of peculiar authorship which produced the "Bibliomania," the "Decameron," the "Bibliographical Tour," and many other works, brilliant in research, style, and decoration. His books, indeed, had a popularity, and were all of curious and unique fame

As a minister of the Church of England, Dr. Dibdin was active, zealous, and effective in the parish care of his duties. His "Sunday Library" enhanced his clerical reputation, as did, also, other religious publications. After being for twenty-four years the respected Rector of St. Mary's, Bryanston-square, Dr. Dibdin died on the 18th instant, in his 72nd year.

CAPTAIN GROVER.

THIS gallant officer was educated at Soho, under Dr. Barrow, contemporary with Sir John Moore, and one of a high population military scientific and [illegible] with the philanthropic Dr. Wolff. By him the mission of the worthy Doctor to Bokhara was projected, and his chivalrous conduct in raising the Scots and Cornish fund is well known. To his exertions Dr. Wolff owes the preservation of his life, by the intervention at Bokhara of the friendly power of Persia. It is much to be feared that his energy in the cause contributed to his early death, since after the event he appeared to gradually lose his voice, and to fail in bodily, though never in mental faculty. Captain Grover died at Brussels on the 8th instant.

MR. NEALE.

J. P. NEALE was an artist whose illustrative talents did the highest honour to the profession. He was the well-known designer of the "Views of Westminster Abbey," and he was also the author of that justly favourite work, "Neale's Country Seats of the Nobility and Gentry." Most of our finest ecclesiastical structures have been given in beautiful and elaborate embellishment by him to the public; and we have a vivid recollection of his beautiful drawings of Mr. Barry's design for the New Houses of Parliament. During his useful life, he had the respect and admiration of a host of friends: his services for nearly half a century in the appointment he held at the Post Office were highly esteemed and approved. Mr. Neale died on the 14th inst., at Tattingstone, in Suffolk.

OPPOSITION TO MR. KERSHAW.—Friday a meeting of the Conservative electors of Stockport was held at the Warren Bulkeley Arms, the Rector in the chair, to consider who should be called upon as a candidate in the room of Mr. Fielden. After some discussion, it was unanimously resolved that Major Marsland should be brought forward as the second Tory candidate.

A SOMEWHAT remarkable undertaking is at this moment in progress in Sweden—that of lowering the waters of the great lake of Oleren to the extent of twelve feet. This operation has become necessary, in consequence of the construction of a railway from Stockholm to Gothenburg. It will cause upwards of 10,000 acres to be brought into cultivation.

HENRY KEITH STEWART, Esq. On Saturday, a commission de lunatico inquirendo was opened before Mr. Commissioner Winslow, and 16 special jurors, to inquire into the state of mind of H. K. Stewart, Esq., son of the Hon. John Henry Keith Stewart, and nephew of the Earl of Galloway. There were present the Hon. Granville and Charles Stewart, and other members of the above noble family, which traces its descent from the celebrated Sir Walter Stewart, who was High Steward of Scotland at the commencement of the 13th century, a descendant of whom was James Stewart, King of Scotland, who ascended the throne in the year 1371. The commission, which was unopposed, was taken out at the instance of the Hon. John Henry Keith Stewart, with a view to the due appropriation of a sum of £10,000, at present under the control of Mr. H. K. Stewart, the alleged lunatic, who is but 26 years of age. The unfortunate gentleman was, at the conclusion of the evidence, introduced; and, by his answers and deportment, as fully bore out the testimony, that the Jury, without hesitation, returned a verdict, "That Henry Keith Stewart is now of unsound mind, and has been so since the 1st of February, 1847."

LOCAL ACTS. By a Parliamentary Index, issued on Saturday, it appears that, in the Session of 1847, as many as 720 reports were made relative to applications for local acts. It was provided by the statute 9 and 10 Victoria, cap. 106, that reports should be made by competent parties, with the view of saving the great outlay which had occurred in obtaining acts for local purposes. The reports, the index of which was printed on Saturday, are the first made under the new law.

MDLLE. CARLOTTA GRISI, who is now engaged at Brussels, on Sunday last met with an accident that for a time caused some uneasiness to the audience. In the second act of "Giselle," she crosses the stage on a sort of eclouë; the machine being launched too quickly, it struck against one of the decorations, and Mdlle Grisi received a severe blow on the leg and on the arm; in spite of the pain caused by the accident, she, however, continued to the end of the ballet.

THE "STEPHEN WHITNEY."—Captain Thomson, formerly commander and part owner of the Stephen Whitney, together with Mr. Sands, of Liverpool, also part owner and consignee of the unfortunate ship, have arrived in Cork, and proceeded to the scene of disaster. Ship and cargo were fully insured. The remainder of the crew are in Cork, in a very distressed state; steps, however, are being taken for their relief. The Society of Friends, as usual, takes the lead in the work of charity.

THE BOOK FAIR AT LEIPZIG.—The Press publishes the following letter from Leipzig:—"The catalogue of the books to be offered for sale at the approaching fair contains 4871 articles in that trade, comprising books, journals, and geographical maps, being about 1000 less than last year. But, still, the proportion of pamphlets written in German increases. Amongst those pamphlets on religious controversy, and scientific and political subjects, 76 were published by Dissenters, 37 are relative to the high price of provisions and the necessities of the labouring classes, and 10 on the potato disease."

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

Affairs in the City during the past week have continued to wear a comparatively cheerful aspect: Confidence is gradually increasing, and the discount houses and bankers are daily growing more liberal in their advances. The determination of the Directors of the Bank of England, to cease making eight per cent. the maximum rate, transpired on Monday, and was supposed to make all that the Government guarantee to the Bank for extending its issues, had been withdrawn. This proved to be the case, the following confirmatory correspondence appearing on Tuesday:

" DOWNING-STREET, Nov. 23, 1847.

" Gentlemen,—Her Majesty's Government have watched with the deepest interest the gradual revival of confidence in the commercial classes of the country.

" They have the satisfaction of believing that the course adopted by the Bank of England on their recommendation, has contributed to produce this result, whilst it has led to no infringement of the law

" It appears, from the accounts which you have transmitted to us, that the reserve of the Bank of England has been for some time steadily increasing, and now amounts to £5,000,000. This increase has in great measure arisen from the return of notes and coin from the country.

" In bullion exceeds £3,000,000, and the state of the Exchanges promises a further influx of the precious metals.

" The knowledge of these facts by the public is calculated to inspire still further confidence.

" In these circumstances it appears to her Majesty's Government that the purpose which they had in view in the letter which we addressed to you on the 25th October, has been fully answered, and that it is unnecessary to continue that letter any longer in force.

" We have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

" Your obedient humble servants,

(Signed) " J. RUSSELL.
" CHARLES WOOD.

" The Governor and Deputy Governor of the Bank of England."

" Bank of England, Nov. 23, 1847.

" Gentlemen, We have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day's date, in which you communicate to us, that, in consequence of the general revival of confidence in the commercial classes of the country, it appears to her Majesty's Government that the object they had in view in the letter they addressed to us on the 25th October has been fully answered, and that it is unnecessary to continue that letter any longer in force.

" We have the honour to be, Gentlemen,

" Your most obedient servants,

" JAMES MORRIS, Governor,
" H. J. PRESCOTT, Dep.-Governor

" To the First Lord of the Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer."

An improvement in the Funds, and in those lines of railways finished and paying dividends, was the immediate result. A few weeks of the growing confidence that has been evident during the last few days, must speedily communicate itself to trade, and the commercial embarrassment for the prejudices during the next few months. Whenever a revival of business really commences, great activity must immediately take place. The universal shortness of stocks, existing for some months past, must produce this result. The steps to strong anticipations of the effect of the next Spring trade, not only in connection with the home trade, but also with our exports. By this means, the gold will find its way back to this country, and the circulation will be restored and established.

The draughts of the West India Bank were, on Monday, refused acceptance by their agents, the Union Bank of London. It appears that the West India Bank had, against the wishes and earnest warnings of the manager of the Union Bank, continued to purchase the bills of Higginson, Dean, and S.ott, of Barbadoes, on Barton, Irlam, and Higginson, of Liverpool, to the extent of £47,000. The capital of the concern, which was established about two years back, is £120,000, but its liabilities are large, and wholly disproportioned to this amount. Exchange operation constituted one extensive feature of the business carried on, to such a great extent on interest as they were accustomed to negotiate. Judging from the last balance-sheet presented, dated August 27, 1847, the general affairs of the institution appear to have been conducted in a most unsound manner, the bash in hand to meet £54,640 of notes in circulation, balances due to other banks, and deposits from customers, being only £34,167, or .ess than one-twelfth of the amount

By the terms of the charter of the West India Bank, the liability of the share holders is such as, under any circumstances, to place the ultimate solvency of the concern almost beyond doubt. The conditions of the charter, which was granted, we find, in 1841, required that one-fourth part of the capital should, within two years from that date; and although compliance with this was dispensed with at the time by a Treasury minute, in consequence of representations from the Bank that the call would be made in small instalments, it still continues to be provided that after this shall have been paid, and the full capital of the Bank shall have thus been constituted, the proprietors are then to be responsible for the amount of their entire shares. In no way the actual amount or guarantee to the creditors of the Bank may be stated at £480,000; so that, although the objectionable course of departing from the principle of unlimited responsibility has been permitted to the West India Bank, there is still a sufficient amount of liability to afford considerable protection.

The estate of Messrs. Bennuson is likely to be administered by the Bankruptcy Court. The liabilities are £59,000, and the assets only £3951, and the losses by bad debts seem to be about £27,000, although one item of £22,000 is Messrs. Isat, does not appear in the balance sheet, and is said to have been overlooked.

The clothing establishment of Messrs. Bell and Meredith Brodi. and Bodin, bankers of Sansbury and Shaftesb.ry, took place on Tuesday, in Basinghall-street, whom debts to the extent of nearly £50,000 were proved, principally upon notes and deposits.

A statement that appeared in last week's ILLUSTRATED NEWS with regard to a circular issued by Messrs. Trueman and Cowell, stock and share brokers, in Lombard-street, relative to the dividends to have been issued by Mr. J. F Mason, in which he informs the custo ners of the late firm, with whom he was engaged seventeen years, that he has decided on carrying on the business of a broker on his own account.

On the determination of the Bank of England to reduce the rate of interest to 7 per cent. becoming known, a considerable excitement was caused in the Stock market. Consols opened at 85¾ to ⅞, but, afterwards, yielding to some heavy sales, quoted 84. An advance of ¼ per cent., however, resulted upon the course pursued by the Directors of the Bank of England being corroborated, but a slight depression upon the news of the difficulty in which the West India Bank was placed, caused Consols to close at 84¾ to 85, for money. Anticipations of the Queen's Speech being, in many respects, favourable, in addition to the publication of the Ministerial correspondence with the Directors of the Bank of England, gave an impetus to prices on Tuesday. Consols opened at 84¾ to 85, for money, and gradually improved to 85¾ but, afterwards, slightly gave way, closing at 85¾ for money and time. On Wednesday Consols opened heavily, at 84¾ to 85, but a purchase of 300,000 stock to close a large account, caused an advance to 85¾, which was brought in sellers, at a fall of ¼ per cent. was the consequence. Another rise occurred, and the closing price was 85¼ to ⅝. Thursday was settling day in Consols, and two firms were declared defaulters, one being very heavy Bears. It proved a Bear account, and the party are heavy losers. The necessity for buying in their accounts gave a buoyancy to prices, from which a further improvement to 85⅞ to ¾ was effected. Exchequer Bills have improved, but not to the extent of Consols: nor has Bank or India Stock shared fully in the advance. The report that the India Company were about to commence coining two lakhs of rupees daily was the cause of a sale of deferred bonds, amounting to £784 390, " in respect of which a distinct class of new bonds were created (lettered E and for £470,610) and deposited in the Bank of England." The deposit thus alluded to was made to provide against the contingency of certain bonds which were known to have been held by Lizardi and Co. in connection with a former conversion having, " contrary to the intentions of the Government of Mexico," by any possibility found their way into circulation, and Schneiders therefore suggested to the Minister that there were two ways of throwing light upon the matter, and of removing the difficulty.

On the day following the despatch of this reply to the Minister, Schneiders received another communicati n from that personage, requiring them to consent to, and assist at, the delivery up, to certain persons nominated by the Mexican Government, of the bonds above mentioned as deposited in boxes at the Bank of England, and of which boxes they (Schneiders) hold one of the keys. To this a reply was immediately sent, that the " bonds in question were created for a special purpose, and that they were deposited in the Bank of England in the joint names of the Mexican Minister and.of themselves (Schneiders) as security that they should be applied to that purpose, if necessary, and no other," and that, under these circumstances, compliance was impos ible.

The whole of the correspondence was afterwards transmitted to the Chairman of the Committee of Bondholders, who expressed unanimously their approbation of the Course adopted. With regard to the question of paying a dividend on the new Stock to the extent of the amount they had. Messrs. Schneiders' reply, that for performing " the long and laborious operation of conversion, no other remuneration has been made, or is likely to be, save the ordinary uses of the funds already in hand, and rather illiberal they therefore decline to invest the amount in Exchequer Bills, as requested by the Committee of Bondholders."

The Foreign Market has been a little firmer during the week, although the business transacted has been of the most limited description. Mexican Stock advanced on Thursday about ¼ per cent, and the closing prices are nominally :—Brazilian Bonds, Small, 89; Chilian Bonds, Six per Cent, 89: Danish Bonds, 1825, 81¾; Mexican Five per Cent, Account, 15½; Spanish Three per Cent, 28¾ Venezuela Bonds, Deferred, 10½; French Rentes, Five per Cent, 115f. 2 c. Exchange, 25f. 80c.; Dutch Two-and-a-Half per Cent, 52 Guild, 54¾; ditto, Four per Cent Certificates, 85⅝.

The Share Market has advanced as regards the established lines, and continues tolerably firm. Prices, at closing, are for—Birmingham and Oxford Junction, 18¼; Buckinghamshire, 3; Caledonian, 20¾ to 21; London and South Western, 22¾; Eastern Counties, 1½; Edinburgh and Glasgow, 48; Great Northern, 29¼; Ditto London and York, ½; Great South. and West. SATURDAY MORNING.—The Consol Market was in a state of great excitement yesterday, from the numerous failures, arising from the settlement of the Account. The failure of the great house of Mr. Henry Whitmore, and Messrs. Secretan and Capper, the latter firm not having been supported by their principals To these several others may be added. Consols, consequently, opened heavily, and was receded to 84¾ for Money, and 85¾ for Account, at which prices they closed. In the Foreign and Share Markets, there were no occurrences of particular interest.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday

) we have to report the arrival of a very moderate supply of wheat, fresh up to Monday and a large portion of it to Tuesday's market, which greatly out of condition from the previ g damp weather. To-day the show of samples was small, yet, owing to the unfavourable state of the weather, the demand for wheat was dull, and prices rather lower. Barley, Beans, and Peas, without alteration. In malt—the supply of which was exceedingly small—nothing was doing, and the rates were with difficulty supported. Oats were very heavy, and 6d per quarter cheaper. All kinds of seeds were dull, and prices rather lower.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

BREAK-DOWNS OF AN OMNIBUS.—On Monday afternoon, about four o'clock, an omnibus proceeding up Princes-street, Soho-square, heavily laden with passengers inside and out, was upset in consequence of the breaking of the hind axletree: the outside passengers were thrown with frightful violence upon the stones, and two were dreadfully crushed between the top of the vehicle and the road, and, after receiving surgica. assistance, were conveyed to the hospital. Several of the inside passengers were injured by the broken glass.

EXTENSIVE FIRE IN THE LONDON-ROAD.—On Sunday night, considerable destruction of property took place on the premises of Mr. Cullum, a tailor and draper, London-road, at the corner of Seymour-street, Southgate and The Bell. The fire originated in the shop. After incessant exertions on the part of the firemen, the destructive element was arrested, but not a vestige of the stock or property could be saved; the property, however, was insured in the County Office. No person was on the premises at the outbreak of the fire.

SUDDEN DEATH. An inquest was held on Saturday, by Mr. Bedford, Coroner for Westminster, at the Cannon-street Hotel, on the body of a gentleman (a Captain in the Oriental Club), on the body of Mr. George William Traill, aged 54 years, late of the East India Civil Service, who was found dead in an apartment of the Club, on the previous day. The deceased was in the service of Mr. White Cooper, Esq., who found some old adhesions of the heart of long standing, and ch heart itself was four times its usual size. Verdict—" Natural Death from disease of the heart."

CALAMITOUS FIRE IN CHANCERY-LANE.—A fire of a very destructive character broke out upon the premises of Mr. William Morris, a paper-stainer, carrying on business at No. 3, Porsman-place, Globe-lane, Mile end, by which the occupant, together with his family, were nearly burned to death.

LOSS OF THE " LADY KENNAWAY." The East Indiaman, Lady Kennaway, belonging to the representative (an only daughter) of the late Thomas Ward, Esq., of Hoxton, was totally abandoned by her crew on the 24th of July, in a very sinking condition, on Monday week. She was commanded by Captain Eneray, and her first officer was Mr. Richard Walsh, of Cork. She left Bombay on the 21st of June, bound to London, with a cargo valued at £210,000, consisting principally of indian silk, crapes, Cashmere shawls, gums, spices, rice, &c. She arrived at St. Helena on the 9th September, and put again to sea on the 14th, expecting to be in London by the 1st October. The voyage was, however, retarded by adverse winds, the vessel having to lie-to off the Cape a storm for six weeks; but, on Sunday morning week, when in the Bay of Biscay, the wind became fair for a run to London. After dinner that day, the crew, amounting in all to 120 persons, were below, the watch announced a coming storm, the ultimate effects of which reduced the noble craft to a complete wreck. The Lady Kennaway spoke the East Indiaman Resperdad, off the Cape of Good Hope, in distress, the Resperdad being then bound to the same owner. The Lady Kennaway had only made two voyages, and the Sirpenbeath six.

DISTRESSING AND FATAL OCCURRENCE.—On Thursday se'nnight, as Mr. and Mrs. Campbell, of Bythwood, Glasgow, and their third son, a fine boy of six years of age, were returning home in their carriage from the residence of J. Campbell, Esq., of Kames, while crossing the Forth and Clyde Canal, by a canal drawbridge, the horses became restive, and brought the carriage in contact with the rail of the bridge, which gave way, and the vehicle and horses, with the whole of the party, including the driver and footman, were precipitated into the water. A more dreadfully perilous situation can scarcely be conceived: the sufferers being immersed in a considerable depth of water, with the walls of the lock above them to the height of form twenty feet, entirely shut out either side; and, as the consequences were, it must be considered a matter of thankfulness and surprise that the occurrence did not prove more extensively fatal. They were saved, however, through the heroic efforts of a man resting in sufficient time to bring them up to nearly the level of the bank. Mr. Campbe.l's son alone was drowned. The horses were killed by the violent shock of the fall.

HEROIC CONDUCT. A waggoner named Peak, while employed on Monday at Roff's-wharf, Woolwich, in holding a rope attached to a vessel, fell off the barge on which he was standing, and immediately sunk to the bottom. In a minute or two after he rose to the surface on the other side of the barge, completely exhausted, when a gentleman, whose name has not been obtained, jumped into the water, and succeeded in bringing the drowning man to shore. Peak is still alive, and it is to be hoped will recover, although so long under the water.

DEAL.—A frightful accident happened here on Monday morning, as the half-past seven o'clock train was taking its departure for London. Mr. Hodgson, the man in charge of the gate (a short distance from the terminus), observing his favourite dog on the rail which the engine was rapidly approaching, rashly attempted to preserve the animal by removing him from that perp. ous. The poor fellow, blinded by attachment to his dog, had no doubt miscalculated his distance from the train, and the consequence was, the dog was speedily crushed, while the man, more fortunate, having fallen in the bank, was caught by the guard-iron, which ploughed its way to a considerable extent in the groin; and in this way he was borne along a distance more than 50 yards. The endeavours to stop the engine were most prompt and successful, and immediate assistance was promptly obtained, but in the course of the day it was deemed requisite to remove the sufferer to the Canterbury Hospital.

PAINLESS OPERATIONS FROM THE INHALATION OF CHLOROFORM The medical profession have hardly recovered from the intense excitement, which was produced upon the first announcement, that operations could be performed without pain, when another startling announcement has been engrossed by the discovery of Dr. Simpson, of Edinburgh, that chloroform could be substituted for Ether, with the production of the same result, although a far less quantity was employed. A few days will suff

THE NEW CLOCK TOWER, AT EPSOM.

NEW CLOCK-TOWER AT EPSOM.

Epsom Salts and Epsom Races have kept in remembrance the olden celebrity of this centre of fashion. Time was when here were several taverns, reputed to be the largest in England; there were long rows of sedan chairs and numbered coaches in the street; a public breakfast, with dancing and music, every morning at the Wells; a ring, as in Hyde Park; evening assemblies, &c.; and, of such importance was the place, that, in the London Gazette of June 19, 1684, it was announced, "the Post will go every day to and fro betwixt London and Epsom, during the season for drinking the Waters."

In the reign of Queen Anne, 1711, one Mr. Toland printed a florid description of Epsom, in which he refers to several rural retreats, "so separated from each other by fields, meadows, hedge-rows, plantations, orchards, and the like, that they seem to be so many distinct little villages, uniting into one considerable town at the large street, in the middle of which stands the watch-house. As I wish to see this a more stately edifice, I also long to have the whole space about it, from the New Parade down to the Spread Eagle, neatly pitched, considering that flint stones are so near, so plentiful, and so cheap."

At this period, several persons of rank and fortune resided in the town and neighbourhood; so that, after the fashion of Epsom had fled, it became a place of more permanent mark and character. Time wrought great changes in the street: the avenues of trees mostly disappeared; the large taverns were mostly let as private houses; and what was once a gay promenade, settled down into a quiet country town. During all these mutations, however, there remained the watch-house which Toland wished to see "a more stately edifice;" until, a short time since, the inhabitants of Epsom, with a spirit worthy of their famed town, resolved to remove what was considered a century and a quarter before so discreditable an object; and they determined to erect on its site the handsome Clock Tower, which we have shown completed in our Illustration.

The new structure is, in its general proportions, taken from the Italian campanili. The detail is, however, original, and in elegant taste; the architects, Messrs. Butler and Hodge, having in the design not overstudied the rigid severity of precedent. The elevation will be about 70 feet. The base will be square in plan, and will be used as an engine-house; it will be of red and Suffolk brick, rubbed fair; and at each angle will be placed a lion bearing a shield charged with the arms of a nobleman resident in the neighbourhood. The shaft will be of square form, and will bear four clock dials, to be illuminated at night; surmounted by an open arcaded lantern, of not unpicturesque outline, terminated with a weathercock and Pegasus, the latter characteristic of the olden fame of Epsom. The heraldic lions on the base, the clock pediments, and other enrichments, will be sculptured in Caen stone; so that, in addition to graceful form, the polychromic effect, arising from the use of variety of colour in materials, has been carefully studied.

The foundation-stone of this new Clock Tower was laid yesterday week, by T. Tompson, Esq., of Epsom, the Chairman of the Building Committee. An elegant silver trowel was prepared for the occasion, and presented to the Chairman by the architects. After the ceremony, the party retired to a sumptuous dinner, prepared at the King's Head Inn. The laying of the stone was witnessed by several hundreds of persons; the town was very animated; and the event was celebrated out of doors, in the old English fashion, by a liberal distribution of strong ale.

Many of our readers will recollect the site of the Tower, close by the large pond in the centre of the town. It may not be so generally known that the water of the pond is favourable to the increase of gold and silver fish, which have frequently been taken out with a common cabbage-net.

Postal Arrangement with France.—It is understood, that, by the new arrangement, one mail is to leave London every day, at half-past eleven in the morning, to arrive in Paris the following morning, at half-past four o'clock; this mail is to be conveyed viâ Dover and Calais. The other mail is to leave London with the ordinary mails at half-past eight at night, and is to be conveyed viâ Dover and Boulogne, and will reach Paris at half-past ten the following morning. From Paris a mail will be despatched daily, at noon, to reach London at half-past four in the morning; this is to come viâ Calais and Dover. The other mail from Paris will leave at seven o'clock in the evening, and reach London at half-past ten on the following morning; this will be conveyed viâ Boulogne and Dover. This is a saving of about eighteen hours as compared with the time at present occupied, but it is not nearly the saving which may now be immediately accomplished.

Copyright of English Subjects in Hanover.—By an Order of Council, which appears in the Gazette of Saturday last, dated the 30th of October, 1847, it is declared, in pursuance of powers granted by treaty between her Majesty and the King of Hanover, and, by the Act of Parliament relating to international copyright, that the authors, inventors, designers, engravers, and makers of books, prints, and certain other works of arts, first published in Hanover, shall have the privilege of copyright therein. And, by another Order of Council of the same date, it is further declared, that, from and after the 30th of October, 1847, in lieu of the duties of Customs, heretofore payable upon books, prints, and drawings, published at any place in the kingdom of Hanover, there shall be payable on books originally produced in the United Kingdom, and republished in Hanover, a duty of £2 10*s.* per cwt.; on books published or republished in Hanover, not being books originally produced in the United Kingdom, 15*s.* per cwt.; on prints and drawings, plain or coloured, published in Hanover, single, each, 1*d.*; bound or sewed, the dozen, 1½*d.*

SIAMESE BOAT ON THE SERPENTINE.

SIAMESE OUTRIGGER ON THE SERPENTINE.

This novel Boat is the invention of W. Austin Ashe, Esq., who has repeatedly tested its capabilities on the Serpentine, in Hyde Park.

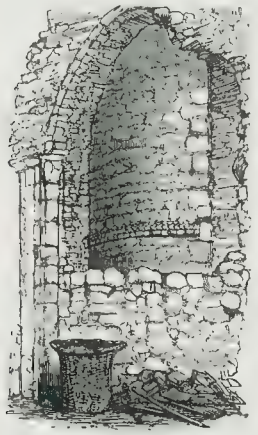
It consists simply of two zinc tubes, of boat-like form, each 24 feet long, 4½ inches wide, and 4½ inches deep; connected collaterally by semicircular braces, of 10 inches span; the water passing freely between the boat-like tubes, whilst the rower is seated in the manner shown in our Illustration.

The principle has been found to combine great speed and lightness, with safety; but the zinc being too pliable to retain its shape, the inventor has commissioned Woolsencroft at Putney, to build a wooden boat of the same design; and it is proposed to test its speed with a first-class outrigger on the Thames.

Without wishing to detract from Mr. Ashe's claim to the novelty, we may mention that a few days since, we noticed in the Model Room at Somerset House, the model of a Market Boat, such as is used at the Point de Galle, in Ceylon, in which the load is placed on two boats precisely as the rower sits in Mr. Ashe's Outrigger.

PORTION OF THE ORIGINAL BUILDING OF ST. MARY OVERIES, SOUTHWARK.

THE fragment, of which the accompanying Cut is a representation, was brought to light a few days since by the fall of a quantity of masonry which had been constructed over it. This is probably a portion of the Norman structure founded by William Pont de l'Arche and William Dauney in the year 1106.



REMAINS OF THE CHURCH OF ST. MARY OVERIE, SOUTHWARK.

The building thus exposed, presents the appearance of part of a semicircular apsis, having a string-course, ornamented with an indented and billet moulding.

The remains, by which the original fabric has been covered, consist of coarse rubble, and the portion of an arch, together with some clustered columns in the Early English style.

The circumstance of this large arch having been erected upon the Norman building, indicates that it could not have been intended as an entrance to the church; and this, together with the appearance of foundations which have been discovered contiguous, render it probable that the Early English remains are a portion of the interior of the Chapter House. Hence, down to the edge of the Thames, extensive foundations have been found, indicating the site of buildings probably belonging to the Monastery, said, on the authority of Linsted, to have been founded long before the Conquest, by Mary, the daughter of the ferryman, and afterwards converted by a noble lady named Swithin, into a College for Priests.

The portion of the Norman structure, recently discovered, is situated on the north side of St. John's Chapel, now used as the Vestry Room. The space between the wall of the Vestry Room and the outer surface of the apsis, is 15 feet, but what this consists of is not known.

The original building, judging by the visible portion of the apsis, has been smaller than the present Church, and appears to have occupied the northern part of the space which the latter now covers

A few years ago, in digging for a family vault in the centre of the present choir, near the altar, it was necessary to cut through the basement of a very ancient wall, which appeared to have been the southern boundary of the original choir

About that time we were attracted by the appearance of an effigy apparently that of a Templar, executed in oak, and of fine design, which had been erected in the north transept of the Church. Our suggestion induced the churchwardens to have this figure preserved, and placed in a niche where there are two lying in a position which the recent discovery seems to indicate as appropriate near to the altar. We had an idea at the time that the above might be the tombs of the founders, and present appearances tend much towards strengthening such a supposition. The effigy was found to be proportionate to the niche where it now remains, and it is highly probable that, in the fine figure, we behold the representation of one of the knightly founders of the Norman Church.—William Dauncy or William Pont de l'Arche.

The reckless indifference under which the late injudicious restoration of the nave was conducted has effected the entire destruction of some curious and beautiful portions of the earlier edifice. Among such manifestations, it is impossible not to regret the small Norman arch of very early character, which, previous to the desecration, stood in the wall of the north aisle. The beautiful west entrance, together with other portions of the building, of the fourteenth century, towards which the poet Gower contributed largely, have disappeared, and given place to a structure, which, compared to the eastern portion of the earlier building, to which it appended, cannot fail to suggest the notion of an architectural Mezentius. However, the former choir (the present choir occupying the site of the nave) and the beautiful Ladye Chapel, together with the tomb of Gower, and some others of interest, render it still worth while turning our back upon the unsightly renovation, to inspect their details, and recal the time when England had few finer churches than St. Mary Overies.

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

We are this day enabled to present to our readers the Winter Paris Fashions, for the gay circles of the capital, the Champs Elysées, and the Boulevards; and these will be the favoured toilettes for the soirée and the ball, as well as for the family party, and the more quiet costume de ville.

First, the Vanille shade has appeared in robes of silk and satin, and is at the head of the favourite winter colours. It is made in silk, satin, and laine, for robes, manteaux, manelets, chapeaux, &c. Velvet is also much in request, generally black, from its best assorting with the ornaments and accessories of whatever colour it may be placed beside. The shades of gros bleu and gros vert are also very recherché. The favoured material, too, is damas rayé, with black satin flowers, or large stripes. Poplins, with large squares of satin, are likewise in request; and, for the morning, robes of black or grey cloth are worn. Nacara velvet is, also, in very recherché taste.

The dresses are made very high, joined at the jupe with rosettes of ribbon in front; with volants notched, or in a number of small points. The jupe is also often trimmed with volants in larger notches, edged with a small fringe. The sleeves are plaited, and are close to the wrist; are rounded in front of the arm, terminated by a small ruche à la vieille, and show a white muslin sleeve fitting to the wrist.

The form of the chapeaux continues round, and fastened low down; the calottes are, also, rounded; the most recherché materials are velvet, satin, and velvet epinglé; the favourite shades being the same as those of the robes.

Velvet flowers, of shades to match the chapeaux, are in high favour; bunches of grapes in velvet, by their graceful flexibility, are charming in chapeaux and capotes; and very small grapes are likewise worn in the hair at evening parties, or the theatre.

The manelets are of velvet, generally trimmed with lace.

MR. VILLIERS, who has been elected M.P. for South Lancashire, has declined to sit for the county. Alexander Henry, Esq., has been proposed by the Liberals as a fit and proper candidate for the vacant seat

A PLANTER'S WILL: TO THOSE ABOUT TO MARRY.—The New Orleans Picayune states, that a Mr. Julien Poydras, of that city, the owner of six large plantations, and of a great number of slaves, died lately, his will directing the sale of his plantations, with their live (human) stock, but with the condition that the purchasers bind themselves to emancipate the slaves, with their increase, at the end of twenty-five years from the day of sale. After certain bequests to his friends and relatives, he wills "to the parishes of Pointe Coupee and West Baton Rouge 20,000 dollars each. The interest of this sum to be employed in giving a dowry to all the girls of the said parishes who may get married: the unfortunate to be always preferred."

PARIS FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

THE PROFESSOR'S LADY.

BY BERTHOLD AUERBACH.

AUTHOR OF "VILLAGE TALES OF THE BLACK FOREST."

THE two friends amused themselves excellently with Lorle, who always anticipated every wish, but, singularly enough, who presented everything with the left hand.

"No doubt, it is out of the right order," said Lorle, who observed that the Sub-Librarian was quite aware of this peculiarity, "that I should be so left-handed. I want to break myself of it, but I always forget."

"That matters nothing," said Reinhard quickly, but in a low voice, that they might not hear him in the outer room; "you do everything so magnificently," added he, "and who can prove that the right hand is cleverer than the left? Your left hand is more skilful than many people's right, and it pleases me perfectly."

At these words, Lorle drew herself up, and a peculiar expression of majesty was in her look.

"Are there no musicians in the village?" asked the Sub-Librarian.

"Certainly there are."

"They shall play this evening to us or a dance; I will willingly pay a reasonable sum," said the Sub-Librarian.

"That cannot be," returned Lorle; "the magistrate is gone from home to-day and it is strictly forbidden to have any music without permission of the police. The regulations hang in your room up stairs."

"Oh, Romance! where art thou?" exclaimed the Sub-Librarian; and Lorle replied, with great simplicity

"We have not got that here, but there is a piano up-stairs which you can ——"

The two friends burst into a peal of such vivacious laughter that they could hardly keep their seats. Reinhard was the first to express his laughter, for he saw, spite of the calm expression of the girl's face, how much she was affected; a pale blue blood visibly in her eyelids, and a smile of deeply-wounded feeling was on her lips. She stood there with beating heart, and twisted the string of her apron so tightly round one finger that it cut into it; the physical pain, however, did her good. It repressed for a moment that of the soul. Reinhard commanded his friend in a stern tone to leave off "that foolish laughter." The Sub-Librarian made many apologies, and took a deal of trouble to explain to Lorle what was the meaning of his words. The girl cleared away the dinner-things quickly, and remained out of tune—as much out of tune as the piano which the Sub-Librarian went up-stairs to try.

He found it terribly inharmonious; there was scarcely a single string which had its proper tone; a great many people had thrummed upon it. "Yes," thought the Sub-Librarian, "when a human being once gets out of tune, then everybody, either for amusement or ill-nature, sets themselves more fully to complete the discord; and when they have completed their work, then the victim is left to stand forgotten in a corner." The Sub-Librarian saw in all this only an image of his own life; he thought only of himself. Fatigued by his morning ramble, and his excited feelings, he slept over the time of the afternoon service.

When Lorle came out of church in the afternoon she went with her brother at once to the valley-mill. Her father, as she knew, was not so easily to be roused, and he had promised to come afterwards with her mother. It is true that Lorle had thought this morning with pleasure about the strangers going with them, and she had felt a little pride about it; but that was now all over. Two hours later, after a deal of urging, the old married couple set out with the young men; and again the Sub-Librarian was in high spirits.

"Your watches here don't go truly," remarked he to the Landlord, "I set mine by the meridian at the library. You might set up a sun-dial here, somewhere on the new church which is now building. Apropos of the subject, why did you not build your new church more upon the hill; the idea is so beautiful of people elevating themselves when they go to church?"

"Because we would have the church at hand," returned the Landlord, "have it ready for all occasions when wanted."

"You are right in that also," said the young man, "neither religion nor the church should be too much removed from daily life; they ought to be part and parcel of it. Ah, how early is the genitens crucem in flower," exclaimed the Sub-Librarian, interrupting himself and springing over the ditch to get the flower.

The Landlord looked after him and smiled; "that's a queer fellow" said he to Reinhard, "he will insist upon having the church set upon the hill, and, when one is not of his way of thinking, that's all right instantly, too; he is like the steward at the salt works down there, who has a morning coat alike on both sides He must be tremendously learned; what has he properly studied for?"

"First of all divinity," returned Reinhard, "and then many languages; he has now got a situation in a library, and there he has everything that he wants. He has firm opinions on all subjects, and is a thoroughly excellent man, that you may take my word for."

"Yes, yes, that I believe."

The Sub-Librarian again joined them; at every step he had to call Reinhard's attention to the beauty of the way; in one place was a group of trees, in another a vista, here was a gnarled branch, and "look," exclaimed he, "how gloriously the sunshine streams in there between the twigs and leaves!"

"Have done with your everlasting exclamations!" said Reinhard. The Sub-Librarian walked on quietly to gather another flower, which he dissected with his pen-knife.

"You must not be so short with him," said the Landlord to Reinhard, "he is indeed a happy man who has nothing more than others, and yet who finds pleasure everywhere, in the sun, in a flower, in a cockchaffer, in everything."

At length they reached the demesne of the mill, and saw two young girls wandering hand in hand along the valley-meadow, singing. "Lorle!" cried the mother; the echo repeated the name. Vroni remained standing where she was, and Lorle sprang to meet the little party. The Landlord stood there with his legs wide apart and his hands on his sides, nodding rapidly with his head; and, in all the paternal pride, plainly said, "show me now a lass like that, either here or anywhere else!"

The family at the mill cordially welcomed Reinhard, and his friend also was kindly greeted, for here, where everybody lived as if they were related, our friends belong to us like members of the family. The table was spread under the walnut tree; here they all sate, and the old miller showed Reinhard how big his name, which he had cut two years before on the bark of the tree, had grown.* The Sub-Librarian could not take his eyes from the old man, for whose countenance he afterwards found the appropriate expression; he called it an "afflicted face;" one of those noble, oval countenances, hollow-cheeked, with high cheek-bones and temples, and large blue eyes, full of humility and much suffering, which figure in the sorrowful stories of the German people

"Yes," said the old man, threatening Reinhard with his finger, "the rascal, they tell me, has painted me in a particular picture; was that honest and right, think ye?"

"There's nothing in that," laughed the Host of the Linden Tree; "he's welcome to paint me when and how he likes."

"Done!" exclaimed Reinhard, stretching forth his hand; but as he received no hand in return, he added, laughing, "It was only joke, there are no colours so fat as you are."

Everybody laughed, and the Miller enquired, "But now tell me truly what you made out of me?"

* See the Illustration at page 332.

"Nothing improper," replied Reinhard. "At the time when I was making a sketch of the mill, as I was going away one evening, just when the sun was setting, your window was opened, and you looked out; you took the cap from your head, held it between your hands, and repeated aloud a prayer during the going down of the sun. It very much affected me, and I thus painted you; excepting that I placed you as standing at the half-door instead of at the window."

"I am exceedingly obliged to you," said the Landlady.

They all sate together merrily, and when Reinhard confided to them, under the promise of secrecy, that he would make a present of an altar-piece to the new church. The Landlord offered him free quarters in his house as long as he should be occupied upon it; and the Miller would also do something, only he did not exactly know what.

A deep silence prevailed for sometime over the whole company—for after having sunken of those good and pious subjects, it was not easy to find another. The Sub-Librarian at length interposed and said, "The girl will take the cakes round wards, placing supper on the table; the glasses were presented, but nobody helped themselves, because all their thoughts were on the church. Lorle accordently avoided the Sub-Librarian—and he, therefore, inquired from Vronl whether there was any legend about the mill, and whether any water-fairies bathed themselves in the water.

"Yes," a fairy bathes herself in it," replied Vronl. Everyone tittered to himself The Sub-Librarian, however, was not to be deterred from his object, and, turning to the old man, he asked him to relate the legend of the mill dam.

The Miller said that those were all tales for children; but the Sub-Librarian urged him, and, therefore, he told him, that, during the Swedish war, a Swede wanted to carry off the miller's daughter by force. "She ran into the granary, taking the ladder up after her: on this the Swede climbs up the mill-wheel; and, when he is on the top, there comes the little water-fairy, sets the mill a-going, and, 'splash' down goes the Swede and is drowned."

"It is a charming legend," said the Sub-Librarian.

The evening passed they hardly knew how. The two girls made themselves merry in all kind of ways, at the Sub-Librarian's expense; they fancied he was superstitious, and told him all sorts of ghost and goblin stories, especially Lorle, who related everything as if she herself believed it, in order that she might infuse as much terror into him as possible. He, however, was quite happy by all this treasury of tales, and never once remarked the concealed trick.

"Your friend is just like a child, and yet he is such a learned man," said the Landlord to Reinhard, when Reinhard was gone with Vronl.

Stephen remained at the mill; Lorle walked beside her mother, and the Sub-Librarian accompanied them.

"How one can see the past and the future," said he to the mother; "You must, at one time, have looked like Lorle, and Lorle, some day, will be a handsome old lady like you." The Landlady smiled, and yet she did not like it, for the peasants, though they are fond of praise, dislike flattery. Besides, to have a great dislike to be described or criticised. Our learned friend, however, began again. "But, tell me," said he, "how it happens that one seldom sees handsome old people in a village, and so many handsome old women?"

"Ay, you see," returned she, "most people are poor and cannot afford to keep servants, and so, when a woman is ill, she must be up before perfect recovery, standing at the washing-tub, and so many handsome old women?"

"You should set on foot a society to care for such poor women," said he; and he went on to describe how it should be; the Landlady made some objections, but ended by saying, "you are a very amiable man," and Lorle remarked "that the young girls might be useful in such a society."

It was twilight when they left the village. Reinhard joined himself to a troop of young fellows, and went singing with them through the village. It was quite night when he came home; and then, springing up the stairs, he again rushed out. The Sub-Librarian sate in his chamber and noted down some of the legends which had been told him. Reinhard sate under the Linden-tree with his guitar on his knee, and all the men of the village gathered round him. And of all he played and sang he was capable of bringing out of that charming instrument so skilfully that, now melting away, now rejoicing, it spoke to every heart. The assembled group stood still and listened: it pleased them very much, and yet, as he had finished, they feared that he would do nothing but play.

"But you can sing, too: won't you give us a stave?" said Martin, speaking out the general wish.

Reinhard sung them a few short songs, which he had picked up in his travels. His voice resounded in the still night, and his jodding tones leapt up like balls of light into the starry heavens, and then crept down again.

Lorle, who was just about going to bed, looked out at the window and listened. "He is a glorious fellow, after all: there is not another like him in the whole world," said she inaudibly to herself.

Reinhard sang:—

When comes the lovely eventide
And tints the cherry boughs,
The goatherd leads his lively goats,
The milkmaid tends her cows;
The woods are green with dewy leaves,
And green with grass the leas,
And when I on my milkmaid think
My heart is full of peace.

The Sub-Librarian knew the song, and sang the bass. Lorle, however, closed her window at the commencement of the next verse, and lay down quietly in bed. Towards the end of that most naive of popular songs, nearly all the young men joined in, and the last verse was rung out amid loud cheering.

The lad is not what once he was—
No joy have I to-day:
The maid is gone that I come, be sure
I will not be said nay.
With that he gave a lusty shout,
The woods rang all around,
The milkmaid's eyes o'erflowed with tears
The while she heard the sound.

"And that song was made by a Swiss shepherdess," exclaimed the Sub-Librarian with enthusiasm.

"Good night to your heart's-dearest, good night," said Reinhard, and went into the house. The young peasants sang the new song as they went down the village, and laughed amazingly.

"It has been a joyful day," said the Sub-Librarian to his friend. "How beautiful is music at night! Light is a rival of song; it likes it not. The dark night, however, cradles it softly in its tender arms. You understand perfectly how to go on with the people; one should impart to them the new revelations through song; in it all things are one, the highest and the lowest class of minds are again united in song." Reinhard made no answer, for his friend continued. "Yes, I see very clearly that the people and the priest and the pair of lings of song, or, I should say, the wandering of popular songs. One so often finds a folk's song of an entirely local character in a distant place; men like yourself are the butterflies who convey the fructifying flower-dust from one blossom to another. We have had to-day everything; a miller's daughter; a landlord's daughter; a publican; a musician; there only wants a sportsman, and then we get the complete romance."

"Have done with your romance; you have already had experience with it to-day."

"You ought to paint the company under the walnut tree," said the Sub-Librarian.

"You have promised not to be suggestive," said Reinhard.

"Forgive me. Good night."

Reinhard was busy arranging his workroom late into the night; he had something in his mind, and he wished to be up early the next morning.

COUNTRY NEWS.

IMPORTANT DECISION.—It has been recently decided in the County Court of Liverpool, that no charge can be made on shipping any [illegible] and a British ship; nor can any [illegible] house keeper [illegible] to pay [illegible] greater length of time than that for which a sailor may actually require accommodation. The system of boarding will in future be by the day, and not by the week.

ROBBERY AT BATTLE ABBEY.—On Tuesday night, or early on Wednesday morning, some burglars effected an entrance into the saloon of Battle Abbey, the residence of Lady Webster, and stole a rose gold watch, set with diamonds, a pair of gold bracelets, several gold lockets, and a quantity of valuable trinkets in gold and silver, with the whole of which they got clear off.

SUDDEN DEATH.—On Saturday last, Mr. Thomas Lees, a retired officer, residing in 45 Rankeilor-street, Edinburgh, fell down in a fit of apoplexy, while walking along St. Leonard-street, and died almost immediately.

MUNICIPAL HONOURS.—The office of Mayor at Exeter is going a-begging. Mr. Snow, banker, who was unanimously elected last week, has declined to qualify. Two of the newly-elected Aldermen, Dr. Pennell and Mr. Miles, have followed the example of the Mayor.

The number of pupils in the School of Design in Birmingham, has received a considerable increase, and amounts at the present time to 466. The energies of the school are entirely devoted to the higher goal of Fine Art, with a view to ensure that the amount of the Government grant is entirely dependent upon the locs subscriptions.

THE ROBBERY AT NORWICH.—On Monday information was received by the metropolitan police, that upwards of 300 volumes of scarce and valuable works, and different articles of [illegible] and silverware, consisting of plate, knives, &c., having the names and crests of the owners engraved thereon, had been found on Mr. Thurtell, horticulturist, of Norwich, comm ted to take his trial at Norwich Castle, charged with a robbery at the house of E. Farrer, Esq., Sporle, Norfolk, and the whole of which are supposed to be stolen.

AT the Wolverhampton Police-office on Friday se'nnight, Thomas Cavanagh was charged with being one of the parties implicated in the death of a boatman named Leonard Thorpe, who was violently beaten at Dudley by some Irishmen on the morning of the 16th August last, and died in consequence of the injuries sustained. On the death of Thorpe, Cavanagh absconded, and was apprehended a few days since at Liverpool. Evidence was given proving Cavanagh to have been present at the disturbance, and in company with a man named Maloney, who has been committed for the same offence; and in addition, Maloney's statement was read, attributing the deceased's death to blows inflicted by Cavanagh, with a leg of one of the tables of the market stalls.—The prisoner was committed to take his trial.

MUSIC.

OPERA AT DRURY-LANE THEATRE.—Miss Birch has arrived in town from Paris, having declined to make her début at the Académie Royale de Musique, in Paris, after the unhandsome treatment she has experienced at the hands of MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan. We refer to the Correspondence of this week's publication elsewhere for the details of this disgraceful persecution of an English vocalist. It is now arranged that Miss Birch will appear at Drury-lane Theatre, in Mr. Balfe's new opera, founded on the ballad of "Lady Henrie;" Madame Dorus Gras has arrived in London, and the rehearsals for "Lucia," the opening opera of the season, with Madame Dorus Gras as Lucia, Mr. Reeves as Edgardo, and Mr. Wilworth Cross as Enrico, have commenced under the direction of M. Berlioz, the Conductor of the orchestra.

SACRED HARMONIC SOCIETY.—Mendelssohn's oratorio, "Elijah," will be repeated on Friday next (this day), and on Wednesday (to-morrow). In addition to the sum of 500*l.* subscribed by her Majesty and Prince Albert to the proposed monument to Mendelssohn, contributions have been received from Costa, Benedict, Sir G. Smart, Sir H. R. Bishop, &c.

THE SINGING CLASSES.—Mr. Hullah gives his first Concert on the 6th of Dec., at Exeter Hall, when Mendelssohn's 114th Psalm, "When Israel out of Egypt came," forms the principal feature, as also Haydn's "Jahn and Jahlee."

CONCERT FOR THE BENEFIT OF THE FAMILY OF THE LATE MR. ROOKE.—Her Majesty, in addition to a donation, has given her special patronage to this Concert, which will be given on Thursday next, the 2nd of December, at the Hanover-square Rooms. Sir H. R. Bishop and Mr. Balfe will be the Conductors. Little did the gifted composer imagine, when his opera of "Amille" was produced, ten years before, with such éclat, that, on the anniversary, an appeal would be made on behalf of his widow and seven children.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Miss Birch has quitted this capital for London. It appears that on Wednesday last a notice was sent to her from the Académie Royale de Musique, to make her début last Sunday, in the character of Alice, in Scribe's "Robert le Diable." Miss Birch's reply to this "call," in theatrical parlance, was, her departure the same evening to Boulogne, on her way to England. It seems that she was engaged for three years as a singing actress, and that one of the principal conditions was, that she was to be provided with efficient masters for the language. On her arrival here she was assigned Professor Michelot, of the Conservatoire, and Emanuel Garcia, the brother of Malibran, and the father of Jenny Lind; Mdme. Pauline Viardot, &c. Miss Birch soon found that the systems of MM. Michelot and Garcia were so opposed that what she acquired from one she had to unlearn for the other. M. Duponchel was therefore, in Scribe's "Diplomatic Veil." Miss Birch's reply to this "call," in theatrical parlance, was, her departure the same evening to Boulogne, on her way to England. On her arrival here she was assigned Professor Michelot, of the Conservatoire, and Emanuel Garcia, the brother of Malibran, and the father of Jenny Lind; Mdme. Pauline Viardot, &c. Miss Birch soon found that the systems of MM. Michelot and Garcia were so opposed that what she acquired from one she had to unlearn for the other. M. Duponchel was therefore, in Scribe's "Diplomatic Veil," withdrawn, and for weeks she was left without masters, until her début was fixed some weeks since. After the rehearsal, which was described in the ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS of the 6th inst., the slightest notice was taken of her until last Wednesday, when the "call" came for her début. Miss Birch felt that this was enough, for if her accent was deficient, as it was pretended at the rehearsal on the 28th of October, it was not to be remedied by the third of November, when no master had been sent in the interval to correct the alleged imperfection. Feeling that no justice was intended by the managers, she preferred, and, as I think, wisely, to withdraw. It is opened, that one of the principal conditions was, that she was to be provided with efficient masters for the language. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—FRIDAY.

EARL SHAFTESBURY sat as Deputy Speaker in the continued absence (from illness) of the Lord Chancellor.

Earl GREY, by command of her Majesty, presented the fourth, fifth, and sixth reports made by the Commissioners appointed to enquire into the distress in Ireland. Also a copy of the correspondence between the First Lord of the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the authorities of the Bank. With their Lordships' leave, he would take that opportunity of replying to a question put to him last night by the Baron Hatherton, now appointed Ambassador. The question was, whether a note had not been addressed from the Bank on Thursday, in which they expressed a wish to reduce the rate of interest, which note was left unanswered until the following Monday. Having referred to the memorandum, he would state the facts of the case. On the Thursday, the Directors of the Bank, at their usual weekly meeting, came to a resolution that it was expedient to reduce the rate of interest upon advances: and the Governor and Deputy-Governor were therefore deputed to communicate to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that it was the opinion of the Board that the rate of interest might be safely reduced. That communication was made verbally, on the Thursday evening, to the present Chancellor of the Exchequer; no formal communication was made, and no formal answer was given. On the following Monday, the Directors of the Bank came to the determination to act upon their resolution of Thursday; they had received no formal answer, but they were perfectly aware that the Government saw no ground for their official interference. They had been told that it was a matter which ought to be determined by the Directors, and by them only; and it was in the exercise of their own discretion that they had adopted and acted upon the resolution of Thursday, upon the Monday following.

Lord ASHBURTON: As he understood it, in point of fact, the Directors communicated their resolution to reduce the rate of interest to her Majesty's Government upon the Thursday. Now, he need hardly assure their Lordships that, in such times as then prevailed, it was of the very highest importance that such a resolution should have been acted upon without delay. Why, then, was the acting upon it delayed until the Monday, unless the Bank were waiting for the decision or opinion of the Government upon it. He did not recollect when the letter to the Bank was withdrawn, but he believed it was not until the Monday, and it was quite clear that, although the Directors had the power, they could not, with propriety, act upon their resolution while that letter was in existence.

Earl GREY repeated his explanation. The letter of the 23rd October only contained a recommendation to the Bank that the discount should be eight per cent., should advances be made beyond a fixed sum. He meant the Bank would be in a position to render any violation of the law no longer necessary, then, of course, the letter ceased to have any effect. It was not formally withdrawn until Tuesday, the day after the rate of interest had been reduced, by an exercise of the discretion of the Directors alone.

Lord ASHBURTON: If it were so, then, of course, no blame attached to the Government: but he must say that it was only shifted to the shoulders of the gentlemen at the Bank.

Earl GREY believed the Directors had very good and valid reasons for postponing the action of their resolution. It might be an error of judgment; but if so, they were upheld in it by those who were best able to form an opinion upon the subject.

In answer to a question from Lord BROUGHAM,

Earl GREY said he hoped Lord Lansdowne would be sufficiently recovered to move for the Committee to inquire into the causes of commercial distress on Thursday next; and he thought the effect of railway investments upon the money market would not be excluded from their cognizance. Some separate inquiry as to what ought to be railway legislation in future might be necessary, and would be entered into at the other House.

The Library Committee was re-appointed upon the motion of the Duke of Richmond, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY

The Speaker took the chair to-day shortly before four o'clock.

Mr. P. Miles and four other members took the oaths, and subscribed the Parliamentary roll.

Petitions on various subjects were presented; amongst them were several against the admission of Jews to Parliament.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL presented three petitions from the Roman Catholic Archbishops and Bishops of Ireland, praying for the removal of all civil disabilities affecting Roman Catholics.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.—Mr. LABOUCHERE moved for the appointment of a Select Committee, to consider whether any and what improvement can be adopted in the mode of conducting private business; viz: Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Strutt, Lord C. Somerset, Mr. F. Baring, Sir W. Heathcote, Mr. Hume, Mr. Wilson Patten, Mr. Wrightson, Sir R. Ferguson, Mr. W. Miles, Mr. Loch, Sir J. Buller, Sir G. Clerk, and Mr. Crde. He thought the Committee of Supply and Ways and Means ought to be relieved from some of the onerous duties he had now to perform in respect to private bills. (Hear, hear.) On the present occasion, however, he did not venture to make any suggestions; he would merely move for an inquiry.

After some slight discussion, the motion was agreed to, and the members of the Committee appointed.

THE ADDRESS.—Lord M. HILL appeared at the bar, and read her Majesty's most gracious answer to the Address on the Royal Speech. Her Majesty said, "I have received with satisfaction your loyal and dutiful address, and I rely with confidence on your co operation with my endeavours to advance the social condition of my people, and promote the welfare of all classes of my subjects."

Mr. BLACKALL gave notice that, on Tuesday next, he should ask a question of the Chancellor of the Exchequer relating to the £8,000,000 loan granted to Ireland.

Mr. FRENCH gave notice that on Monday he should ask what steps the Government intended to adopt with respect to monies advanced to Poor-Law Unions in Ireland.

CROMPTON ELECTION.—A petition complaining of an undue return for Chester was presented and ordered to be referred to a Select Committee.

Mr. BAILLIE gave notice that, on an early day, he should move an Address to the CROWN relating to the Ecclesiastical Duty.

In answer to a question from Mr. DRUMMOND, the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER was understood to say that he intended to propose some alterations in the mode of collecting the small duty.

Lord J. RUSSELL moved that the House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday. —Agreed to.

RAILWAYS.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER rose, pursuant to notice, to move for leave to bring in a bill to extend the time for the purchase of land, and the completion of railway works. The right hon. gentleman commenced by pointing out the usual course of the employment of the floating capital of the country, in agriculture and commerce, and the construction of great public works, in which, of course, he included railways; and then pointed out the pressure and embarrassment that had arisen in the money market, owing to the increased demand that had taken place for that capital of late years, for the construction of railways. After reviewing the use and abuse of railways, he observed that, in 1826, Parliament had sanctioned works to the amount of £1,500,000; from the year 1826 to 1835, the amount sanctioned by Parliament, was £19,000,000; from 1836 to 1837, it was upwards of £30,000,000, but, in consequence of the general distress that existed, comparatively little progress was made with railways till 1844 and 1845, when no less a sum than £74,000,000 was sanctioned. The House and the public were aware of the remarkable fact that in the same year the latter year for railway speculations; and some estimate might be formed of it, when he stated that 800 plans were deposited with the railway department of the Board of Trade: and in the year 1846, the amount actually sanctioned by Parliament was no less than £132,000,000; making a total of £236,000,000; two-thirds of which had been sold within the three previous years. In the year 1847, an additional sum of thirty-eight millions was sanctioned by Parliament. Of the sums already voted, there remained to be expended a hundred and forty-five millions, in addition to the thirty-eight millions sanctioned in 1847. The actual expenditure, commencing in the year 1840, was as follows:—In 1841, the sum expended in railway works was £1,407,000; in 1842, it was £2,980,000, in 1843, it was £4,435,000: in 1844, it was £6,100,000; in the first half of the year 1845, it was £3,500,000; and in the second half of that year, £10,000,000; making in all £14,100,000; in the first half of 1846, the amount was £9 890,000: and in the last half of that year, £26,675,000, so that in the year 1846, no less a sum than £36,565,000 (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") had been expended. In the year 1847, the amount expended was £25,700,000; and, according to the estimates that had been made by the Board of Works, the amount required up to the close of the present year, including the purchase of land, would be little short of £65,000,000. Now, it would appear that, in December, 1846, the pressure for money became extremely severe, and pressed in an unexampled manner upon the available capital of the country; the demand for money for the construction of railways had increased out of all proportion; and when they took into account the embarrassments among the commercial and manufacturing interests, it was evident that some interference was called for on the part of the Legislature. Strong remonstrances and representations had been addressed to himself and the members of the Government, and much more stringent measures were suggested than the Government had thought it right to adopt. (Hear, hear.) They had been urged to put an instant stop to railways in course of construction; but the difficulties of anything in the shape of compulsory enactment were very great, and, therefore, they had not adopted them. When they considered the large number of labourers which were employed on those works, the engagements that had been entered into with manufacturers of all descriptions, they had come to the conclusion that it would be exceedingly injudicious to attempt any compulsory measure. The object of the bill which he was about to propose was to give railway companies the power of extending the time for purchasing land and completing railway works in course of construction. With regard to parties whose land was about to be purchased, he proposed the introduction of a clause giving them a claim for compensation in consequence of the postponement of the purchase. The amount would be assessed in the same manner as the value of the land. With regard to works that were not commenced a stronger course was taken, although it would still be voluntary. He proposed, with regard to this class of railways, to prohibit the directors from completing the purchase of any land or commencing any railway works without having first obtained the consent of a certain proportion of the shareholders. In these cases he proposed that the directors should obtain the sanction of three-fourths of the shareholders. It was also intended to appoint a committee to consider all new railway bills that might be submitted to the House, to consider the mode in which they should be allowed to go on. It was obvious that there were many bills which circumstances might render it necessary to pass, but he trusted the House would see the importance and necessity of not sanctioning any bill requiring the expenditure of a large amount of capital. He thought they ought to take some blame to themselves for the large number of railway bills that had actually been passed— (hear, hear); but hon. gentlemen would bear in mind that nothing was so difficult during the railway excitement that prevailed as to check the progress of these measures. He believed that, so far from receiving any opposition from the railway companies, the course he was about to pursue would receive their cordial support and co-operation. He had communicated with the chairmen of the leading railway companies, and had found them most anxious to co-operate with him. The right hon. gentleman concluded by moving for leave to bring in his bill.

COLONEL PETRE: He had often felt it his duty to oppose the system of railways the formation of which he considered a gross and unjustifiable encroachment upon the rights of private property, and this bill proposed to extend the powers of spoliation of these companies for three years longer.—Laughter.—Lord Lowther would be almost justified in having recourse to the argumentum baculinum against those spoliators, who thus attempted to introduce the despotic practices of Russia in this free land of England. He denied that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was correct, in saying they were all to blame for sanctioning these railway speculations: he (Col. Sibthorp) was not to blame; he had always protested against railways and those who encouraged them and sanctioned them. He did not oppose the introduction of this bill, but he asked the Chancellor of the Exchequer to say to the railway companies, when you propose to take land, you shall either pay for it within a certain time or you shall forfeit your power to do so afterwards.

Mr. ELLICE protested against being included in the category of those who, foreseeing the evils likely to arise from the abuse of this system, had not proposed some remedy for the future. He was glad the noble gentleman opposite, during his Government, to limit the power of these companies to raising capital by their shares, and to deprive them of the power of borrowing money. He thought the measure now introduced was almost the only measure that could be now proposed; but he hoped the same measure would be adopted to limit the powers of these companies as to the borrowing of money, and to protect the lender against the insolvency of their capital subscribed. It was the duty of the Companies applied to the House for extraordinary powers, it was the duty of the House so to limit those powers as to take care that they should not intervene with the interests of those who were engaged in the ordinary transactions of business, and who ought not to be exposed to be crushed by these gigantic monopolies.

Mr. HUDSON reminded the right hon. gentleman the member for Coventry of the support which he had given to a bill for connecting by railway the town of Coventry with the little town of Southend, a bill which had been rejected by the other House of Parliament. He would not say whether or not the powers of borrowing possessed by the railway companies were too large or not; it was a subject for discussion. None of the companies with which he was connected had nearly borrowed the amount they were authorised to borrow. But, surely, the poor man who had accumulated a few hundred pounds, and wished to invest it, was entitled to be considered as well as the borrower; and, if they did not permit them to invest their savings in British railways, they would invest them in foreign railways. That measure was one of the largest importation which had taken place of foreign produce. Railways were constructed solely of British produce. And, although they employed a large number of the poor, and added to their comforts, yet the money was expended solely on British produce. The Manchester merchants, instead of calling on the railway shareholders to stop their calls, should have called upon the merchants importing foreign produce to curtail their acceptances. Those acceptances took away the gold; but the railways employed the poor, and relieved the rates. Had any railway stopped payment, or asked Government for relief? While his railway shares had been at a premium, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's stock had been at a discount. He had never denied that the importation of corn would cause a drain of bullion, and he had undertaken no new works, although he had given up none undertaken. He did not object to the bill, as he had of no use to him, although it might be of service to some, and would please the public. With regard to the causes of the distress, he trusted that the Government would put the Bank Charter upon such a footing that the time might never again occur when it would be impossible to make money upon Exchequer Bills. Just before the Government had issued their letter to the Bank, Exchequer Bills were absolutely unsaleable.

Leave was given to bring in the bill.

COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS.—The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER then moved the appointment of the Select Committee on Railway Bills for this Session.—Agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.—Sir J. PAKINGTON moved that until the Christmas holidays, Orders of the Day shall on every occasion have precedence of Notices of Motion. Parts mentioned in the Queen's Speech should be communicated with the Government, and without intending the slightest disrespect to those hon. gentlemen who had motions on the paper. There were no notices on the paper which would exhibit the enormities and misdemeanors of the Foreign Secretary might, without great public inconvenience, be suffered to remain unnoticed until the usual time of the commencement of the Session. Parliament and the country ought to be prepared to meet the fact that the House had better confine its attention to important public matters until after Christmas.—

Mr. BANKES opposed the motion as most unprecedented, and, as one that, at all events, should not be pressed at a season of the year when a full attendance could not at all events, proper notice of such a motion ought to be given. He had a motion in the paper which did not admit of postponement. He intended to propose that no appointment of Governor of the Isle of Man Commissioner should be made, but that the duties should be performed by the Lord Privy Seal, who seemed to have nothing to do, as he was absent in Italy. He should oppose the motion.—

Mr. HUME had no wish to unnecessarily inconvenience the House, but he should oppose it; and he regretted that, at the end of the Session, orders of the day had been permitted, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, to have precedence of motions.—

Sir J. BOOTHBY thought it more convenient that the hon. Bart to withdraw his motion; at the same time he would press upon the members having notices on the paper that it would be exceedingly convenient to have the public business disposed of before Christmas, so as to avoid the necessity of only adjourning at Christmas for a week The motion was then withdrawn.

SLAVE TRADE.—On the motion of Mr. HUME, various returns connected with the state of the Slave Trade, and the West India colonies, and copies of correspondence relating to the Slave Trade, were ordered.

RAJAH OF SATTARA.

Mr. HUME moved for copies of all documents referred to by Major Carpenter, in his letter of May 25, 1846, to the Secretary of the Governor-General of India, which conferred on the Rajah of Sattara the sanad of his adoption. The hon. gentleman complained that everything which inculpated the Rajah had been laid before the House, but that all documents tending to prove his innocence had been withheld. He (Mr. Hume) would be content that the Rajah was placed on his trial on charges which had been brought against him. He asked the Government if they would give an opportunity of trial to that unfortunate Prince, who had been oppressed and ruined by the arbitrary conduct of Major Carpenter, and by the servants of the Company's service, had expressed his most unhesitating belief. He (Mr. Hume) had at first believed the Rajah was guilty he was now convinced he was innocent; and he was sure that every impartial person who had examined the documents which were already in possession of the House. His answer, therefore, was, that the Government saw no reason whatever to alter the decision which had been come to in the case of the Rajah of Sattara. All the documents material to the case of the Rajah of Sattara, and therefore applicable to the motion (being the sole occupant of the Treasury bench) would not oppose this motion; and he must express his surprise that no member of the Cabinet had thought it right to be present on a question of this kind.

Mr. EWART seconded the motion, and complained of the efforts which had been made to prevent the agents of the Rajah from reaching this country.

Mr. GRANT said he would refer to the papers which, he fullest credit for the motives which had induced him to bring this question forward. He should confine himself solely to the question before the House; and he must protest against being considered as acknowledging the Rajah's innocence. The hon. gentleman complained that everything which inculpated the Rajah had been laid before the House, but that all documents tending to prove his innocence had been withheld. For his part, he Parliament met, according to Royal proclamation, on Thursday, the 18th inst It being the first session after a general election, much preliminary business had to be gone through before the assembled Legislature could be addressed from the Throne. The first proceeding was

THE ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

On Thursday, the 18th, at two o'clock, the House of Commons was summoned to attend the House of Lords.

Mr. Ley, the Chief Clerk, attended by several members, proceeded to the Bar of the Upper House. The Lord Chancellor directed them to proceed to the election of Speaker, and to present him for her Majesty's approval on the following day.

On the return of the Commons to their own House,

Lord SEYMOUR, addressing Mr. Ley, said: Having heard her Majesty's gracious communication to the effect that this House is now called on to choose a Speaker, I present myself to the House for the purpose of making a motion which, I believe, will meet with the cordial unanimity of all who hear me. (Loud cries of "Hear, hear.") Those hon. members who, in former Parliaments, have witnessed the ability, the judgment, and the impartiality with which Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre (cheers) has discharged the high and important duties of Speaker of this House, will at once agree with me that, in the present Parliament, no other selection could be made equally satisfactory to members within this House, or equally advantageous to the public service. (Cheers.) Those hon. members who have not had the advantage of previously sitting in this house, and of witnessing Mr. Lefevre's conduct in the chair, will, I believe, also bear testimony that their first public duty, by agreeing in the selection of that right hon. gentleman, who, in very difficult times, amidst the heat of party conflicts and public debates, has been able, with great courtesy and firmness, to maintain the authority of the chair, and thereby to uphold the dignity and character of this great deliberative assembly. (Cheers.) I believe, also, that they will derive from that right hon. gentleman's experience, and from his knowledge of the details of private and public business, the greatest possible advantage with respect to those matters with which new members cannot at once be intimately acquainted. (Hear, hear.) Anticipating for my motion the unanimous concurrence of all the members present on this occasion, I conceive it will be now unnecessary for me to say more, and I, therefore, shall conclude by moving that Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre do take the chair. (General cheers.)

Mr. J. A. SMITH said: I rise to second the motion of the noble Lord, and I do so with very singular satisfaction, because I believe that it rarely falls to the lot of any one to be able at the same time so perfectly to satisfy his sense of public duty, and also to gratify his personal and private feelings. (Hear, hear.) High as has been the character of the distinguished men who in times past have filled the Chair of this House, and remarkable as has been the judgment of this House in the selection of those men who have been appointed to preside over its debates, I believe I may appeal with confidence to all present who have been before members of this House, and also to public opinion, to decide whether among all those ... man who filled the Chair there was ever any one who discharged the duties of the office more efficiently, or in a manner more calculated to command the confidence of the House and o... the public, than the right hon. gentleman, Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre. (Cheers.) I do not intend to trouble the House with one single word with respect to the importance of ... duties which are imposed on the gentleman who is placed in the Chair of this ho... has been observed on so often and so well, that it would be useless and presumptuous in me to occupy the time of the House by enlarging on the topic; and I feel also that a sense of the importance of the high office of Speaker to be fully settled in the mind of this House and in the mind of the country, that not one word is required from me in reference to that subject. But, with great humility, and with great deference, I should wish to say one word on a point with respect to observe our attention. Every day and every year, in my opinion, the character and influence of this House in reference to other countries, are increasing in importance. We have seen important constitutional changes made in one of the most important countries of the continent. We have also recently seen changes proposed by another Power, and I therefore think that we must shut our eyes if we do not acknowledge that constitutional and representative government and authority therein are making advances throughout Europe. (Hear, hear.) Under these circumstances, I think that the character and moral influence of this House, and of the individual who is appointed to preside over us, are year by year acquiring increase... importance. I shall, therefore, most readily give my support to the motion of the noble Lord, which ... have now the honour of seconding, because I confidently believe that the high and impo... ... duties to which I have alluded ... the right hon. gentleman placed in safer or more able hands than the... ...ntleman has already man Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre. (Cheers.) That right hon. gen... ...rminate and proved that unvarying courtesy may be consistent with unflinching ... firmness and impartiality. (Cheers.) Neither the heat of debate, nor the violence of ... party, have moved him from the faithful discharge of his duties. I shall support the motion of the noble Lord, because I also believe that the right hon. gentleman will assert the privileges of the House without fear or favour, and that, like his predecessor, under his able guidance, will give to the world a proof that perfect order in our proceedings and ready acquiescence in the decision from the Chair are entirely consistent with that freedom of debate which I regard as one of the chief safeguards of the liberties of the country. (Cheers.)

Lord G. BENTINCK said: I am unwilling to allow this opportunity to pass without doing myself the honour of joining in the proposal made by the noble Lord, and seconded by the hon. gentleman opposite. (Hear, hear.) I am the more anxious to do this, because, when the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Lefevre) was less known than he is now to the House, I once joined in opposition to his appointment to the Chair; but, the experience of the time, the attention, and the ... nity with which the right hon. gentleman has occupied the position of Speaker of this House, has made it a matter of great congratulation, not only to me, but, I believe, to every one who, at the time referred to, opposed the election of the right hon. gentleman, that defeat attended that opposition. (Hear.) I feel that the authority of this House depends much on the calmness and dignity with which our proceedings are carried on; and, I am sure that all who join in the ... happiness to witness the manner in which the duties of the high office of Speaker have been discharged by the right hon. gentleman, will join with acclamation in conceding to him pre-eminence over all those illustrious and distinguished individuals who, on former occasions, have filled the Chair. (Hear, hear.) I could not allow this opportunity to pass without expressing my great satisfaction in supporting the motion that Mr. Charles Shaw Lefevre be again appointed Speaker. (Cheers.)

Sir R. INGLIS said: The same reason which has impelled the noble Lord (Lord G. Bentinck) to address the House would justify every one who had been in the same position in rising to express satisfaction at the motion now made. I concur in all those observations of the noble Lord in which he expressed his sense of the successful manner in which the right hon. gentleman (Mr Lefevre) has discharged the duties of Speaker, and also in those feelings with which the noble Lord now hails the resumption by the right hon. gentleman of that high office; nor should I have troubled the House with another word if it had not been that, concurring in every word that has fallen from the noble Lord and the hon. gentleman, the mover and seconder of the present motion, I did not also wish to add another claim which the right hon. gentleman has to our gratitude and confidence, and particularly as that claim is connected with conduct which is not seen by the House in general, but which is not the less important on that account to the public interests of the country—I mean the time, the attention, and the labour which the right hon. gentleman devotes to the conduct of the private business of the House. (Cheers.) It is scarcely necessary to trouble the House with details of the manner in which the private business of the House has increased within the last ten years. It will be enough to state that the private business of the last ten years has greatly exceeded in amount not only the private business of any preceding ten years, but any preceding thirty years, and to the larger part of that business the right hon. gentleman has given the most anxious, patient, and personal attention. (Hear.) The House would be ungrateful were it neglected to acknowledge the services thus rendered by the right hon. gentleman. (Cheers.)

Mr. C. S. LEFEVRE then rose and said: In rising to address a very few words to the House, I beg to assure my noble friend the member for Totnes, and my hon. friend for Chichester, that I fully appreciate those feelings of personal kindness and regard which have induced them to speak of my services in terms of such high commendation, far beyond any merit which I could even hope to possess. I beg to assure the House that I feel I owe to all its members a very large debt of gratitude for the very favourable manner in which they have been kind enough to receive the proposition now made to them, and I feel altogether unequal adequately to express my thanks for this additional mark of their kindness. In all that has been stated in regard to the important duties attached to the office of Speaker of this House I fully concur, and I admit with the hon. member (Sir R. Inglis) that they have been rendered of late years far more arduous by the vast accumulation of private business. (Hear, hear.) The journals of the two or three last sessions exhibit a mass of private business wholly unprecedented, affecting interests of the highest magnitude, and, had it not been for improvements recently introduced, it would have been impossible satisfactorily to dispose of it. I cannot boast of having had much share in the suggestion of those improvements, but I shall always reflect with satisfaction that it has been my privilege to co-operate with hon. members of this House in introducing those salutary changes which have been productive of so much advantage. (Cheers.) Though experience has taught me that the ordinary duties of the Chair might be performed by diligence, patience, and strict impartiality, there are other duties of a more difficult nature, arising out of new and unforeseen circumstances, and allowing no time for deliberation or reflection, which might well discourage much abler men than myself, and I feel convinced, should it be the pleasure of the House again to elect me to the Chair, that the same indulgence and the same effectual support would be extended to me as I have hitherto received at all times and from all sides of the House. (Cheers.) It is this conviction alone which at the present moment enables me in perfect confidence to place myself entirely at the disposal of the House. (Cheers.)

Lord Seymour and Mr. J. A. Smith here approached the right hon. gentleman, and, taking him each by the hand, led him towards the Chair. The mace being laid on the table,

Mr. C. S. LEFEVRE, standing on the steps of the chair, addressed the House as follows: He said: I beg to offer to the House my sincere and grateful acknowledgments for the distinguished honour it has again conferred on me; and I will endeavour to prove myself not altogether unworthy of the choice now made, by pursuing strictly that line of conduct which this day, for the third time, has received your sanction. (Cheers.)

Lord J. RUSSELL rose and said: I now venture to address the House for the purpose of congratulating you, Sir, and, I must add, the House itself, on the choice just made. (Hear, hear.) That you, Sir, will maintain the privileges of this House—that you will act with strict impartiality—that you will render great service to the public in the conduct of the private business of this House, and in maintaining order in our debates—that you will so preserve order in this assembly as to conciliate those whom it may be your duty to reprove—does not seem predicates which are no longer matters of surmise or expectation, but of well-founded confidence. Your previous conduct in the chair justifies the House and me in entertaining this belief. It was your fortune to succeed to a person of distinguished learning, of great knowledge of the Constitution, and of great experience in this House, and whose conduct in the chair was received with approbation by this House. (Hear, hear.) Placed in this position of disadvantage by the qualifications of your immediate predecessor, you have, nevertheless, established a character as Speaker of this House which is not a matter of envy to any one, but is equal to that of any former Speaker, and I trust that, being long in the possession of the honour now conferred on you by the House, your reputation may continue to increase, and that you may have a bright name to posterity as one of the greatest Speakers that ever sat in that chair. (Cheers.)

The noble Lord, before resuming his seat, moved that the House adjourn, and the motion being at once acceded to, the House accordingly adjourned, at five minutes to three o'clock.

APPROVAL OF THE SPEAKER.

The House of Lords met for this purpose at two o'clock on Friday.

The Royal Commissioners were Lord Langdale, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Lord Campbell, Earl Grey, and the Earl of Auckland.

Shortly after two o'clock, the Commissioners entered the House, and took their seats in front of the Throne.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE directed the Usher of the Black Rod to inform the House of Commons that the Lords Commissioners desired their attendance there immediately.

After the lapse of a few minutes, the Speaker, Mr. Shaw Lefevre, appeared at the bar, attended by the Usher of the Black Rod, and followed by several Members of the House; the number of hon. gentlemen, however, who formed the ... bers of the House; the number of hon. gentlemen, however, who formed the ... tran of their President, was far less than that attracted by the opening proceed... of their President, was far less than that attracted by the opening proceedings of the previous day. The right hon. gentleman, according to custom, did not wear his robes of office, but appeared in plain dress suit.

Mr. Speaker LEFEVRE then addressed the Royal Commissioners as follows: I have to acquaint your Lordships that, in obedience to her Majesty's commands, I have repaired to the House of Commons, and, in the name and on behalf of the Commons of the United Kingdom, which they have been heretofore entitled; more especially her Majesty's faithful Commons, have presented me as their Speaker, and that their choice has been confirmed by her Majesty, and I now become, by her Majesty's gracious allowance, their humble petition, to them undoubted rights and privileges to ... which they have been heretofore entitled; more especially freedom from arrest and mo... ...station for the persons of themselves and their servants, freedom of access to her Majesty whenever occasion may require it, and that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to put the most favourable construction ... that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to put the most favourable construction, on all their words and actions, and to ... attributed to me alone, and not to myself I have to pray that any error may be ... as well as on those of her Majesty's faithful Commons.

The Commons then withdrew from the bar, and the Royal Commissioners retired.

Lord Langdale presiding on the woolsack, several Peers took the oaths.

At four o'clock their Lordships adjourned to three o'clock on Monday.

On his return to the House Commons,

The SPEAKER (standing on the steps leading to his chair) addressed the House as follows: I have to acquaint this hon. House that I have been to the House of Peers, where I communicated to the Lords Commissioners authorised by her Majesty that this House had proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their Majesty that this House had proceeded to the election of a Speaker, and that their choice had fallen upon me. The Lords Commissioners confirmed that appointment, and gave me the assurance of her Majesty's gracious sanction thereto; whereupon, I laid claim, on the part of this House, to its ancient and undoubted rights and privileges, especially to the privileges of freedom from arrest for ourselves and our servants, freedom of debate, free access on the part of this House to her Majesty at all reasonable times whenever we require it, and that the most favourable construction should be put upon our words and actions. And I have to inform the House that the Lords Commissioners were authorised, on the part of her Majesty, to concede these privileges to the fullest extent to which they had ever been conceded by her Majesty and her predecessors to this House. I cannot make this communication to the House (continued the right hon. gentleman) without again repairing to the House my sincere and respectful thanks for having again placed me in the high position which I now occupy, and without assuring them that it will always be my endeavour, with the assistance and support of this House, and, after the precedents which took place yesterday, I am confident that I shall always receive that assistance and support (cond cheers)—to maintain the dignity and authority of this House, and that respect due to its rules and orders, on a due observance of which not only the proper and satisfactory discharge of public business, but also the character of the House, must entirely depend. (Cheers.) I have now to remind the House that the only business with which we can proceed is to take the oaths at the table required by law.

The Speaker himself was then first sworn, the right hon. gentleman standing in his place, and the oaths being administered to him by Mr. Ley.

The whole of Saturday and Monday was occupied in administering the oaths to the members; of this ceremony we have given a detailed description, (with an Illustration), at page 345 of our present Number.

HOUSE OF LORDS—MONDAY.

Lord Campbell took his seat on the woolsack, as Deputy Speaker, at three o'clock, when the swearing in of Peers was resumed.

The number of Peers who took the oaths and subscribed the rolls of Parliament was about fifty, and amongst them we noticed the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Rutland, the Bishop of Durham, the Marquis of Clanricarde, the Marquis of Winchester, the Marquis of Angiesey, the Earl of Shaftesbury (who afterwards presided on the woolsack), the Earl of Lonsdale, the Earl of Yarborough, Viscount Strangford, Lord Glenelg, Lord Ashburton, Lord Stanley, Lord Brougham, Lord Lyndhurst, Lor. Kenyon, and Lord Redesdale.

At five o'clock the House adjourned to Tuesday, at a quarter before two o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—MONDAY.

The Speaker sat at twelve o'clock, and the interval from that hour until four o'clock, when the House adjourned, was occupied in swearing in hon. members.

Among the hon. gentlemen who took the oaths to-day were Sir R. Peel, Mr. Labouchere, Lord J. Manners, Dr. Bowring, Lord Albert Conyngham, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, Mr. Robert Stephenson, Mr. Herries, Sir T. F. Lewis, Bart., Mr. Smith O'Brien, and several Irish members.

The number sworn was from 130 to 140.

Adjourned to Tuesday at twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS—TUESDAY.

The doors of the house were thrown open at one o'clock.

Soon after that hour there was a great influx of splendidly dressed ladies, who were ushered into seats on both sides of the House, only the front benches being held in reserve for Peers. The ladies continued to pour in until the whole of the seats appropriated to them were filled. The varied hues of their costumes contributed greatly to set off the appearance of the House.

At a quarter to two o'clock the Earl of Sheffield assumed the seat on the woolsack, as President of the House pro tem., when prayers were read by the Bishop of Rochester.

The oaths were then administered to those Peers present, who had not yet signed the Parliamentary roll.

At two o'clock the Marquis of Lansdowne, the Marquis of Clanricarde, Earl Spencer, the Earl of Auckland, and Lord Campbell, took their seats as her Majesty's Commissioners, when the former Noble Lord (who presided as first Commissioner, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor) ordered Sir Augustus Clifford, the Usher of the Black Rod, to summon the House of Commons to hear the Royal Speech.

In a few minutes the Speaker appeared at the bar, accompanied by a very large party of honourable members, when

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE read her Majesty's most gracious Speech, as follows:—

THE QUEEN'S SPECH.

"MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

"Her Majesty has ordered us to declare to you the causes which have induced her to call Parliament together at the present time.

"Her Majesty has seen with great concern the distress which has for some time prevailed among the commercial classes. The embarrassments of trade were at one period aggravated by so general a feeling of distrust and of alarm, that her Majesty, for the purpose of removing certain doubts and difficulties, felt herself to be recommended to the Directors of the Bank of England a course of proceeding suited to such an emergency. This course might have led to an infringement of the law.

"Her Majesty has great satisfaction in being enabled to inform you that the law has not been infringed, that the alarm has subsided, and that the pressure on the banking and commercial interests has been mitigated.

"The abundant harvest with which this country has been blessed, has alleviated the evils which always accompany a want of employment in the manufacturing districts. Her Majesty has, however, to lament the recurrence of severe distress in some parts of Ireland, owing to the scarcity of the usual food of the people. Her Majesty trusts that this distress will be materially relieved by the exertions which have been made to carry into effect the law of the last Session of Parliament for the support of the destitute poor. Her Majesty has learnt with satisfaction that landed proprietors have taken advantage of the means placed at their disposal for the improvement of land.

"Her Majesty laments that in some counties of Ireland atrocious crimes have been committed, and a spirit of insubordination has manifested itself, leading to an organized resistance to legal rights.

"The Lord Lieutenant has employed with vigour and energy the means which the law places at his disposal to detect offenders, and to prevent the repetition of offences. Her Majesty feels it, however, to be her duty to her peaceable and well-disposed subjects to ask the assistance of Parliament in taking further precautions against the perpetration of crime, in certain counties and districts in Ireland.

"Her Majesty views with the deepest anxiety and interest the present condition of Ireland, and she recommends to the consideration of Parliament measures, which, with due regard to the rights of property, may advance the social condition of the people, and tend to the permanent improvement of that part of the United Kingdom.

"Her Majesty has seen with great concern the breaking out of civil war in Switzerland.

"Her Majesty is in communication with her allies on this subject, and has expressed her readiness to use, in concert with them, her friendly influence for the purpose of restoring to the Swiss Confederation the blessings of peace.

"Her Majesty looks with confidence to the maintenance of the general peace of Europe.

"Her Majesty has concluded with the Republic of the Equator, a treaty for the suppression of the slave trade.

"Her Majesty has given directions that this treaty should be laid before you.

"GENTLEMEN OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS,

"Her Majesty has given directions that the estimates for the next year should be prepared, for the purpose of being laid before you. They will be framed with a careful regard to the exigencies of the public service.

"MY LORDS, AND GENTLEMEN,

"Her Majesty recommends to the consideration of Parliament the laws which regulate the navigation of the United Kingdom, with a view to ascertain whether any changes can be adopted, which, without danger to our maritime strength, may promote the commercial and colonial interests of the empire.

"Her Majesty has thought fit to appoint a commission to report on the best means of improving the health of the metropolis; and her Majesty recommends to your earnest attention such measures as will be laid before you relating to the public health.

"Her Majesty has deeply sympathised with the sufferings which afflict the labouring classes in the manufacturing districts in Great Britain and in many parts of Ireland, and has observed with admiration the patience with which these sufferings have been generally borne.

"The distress which has lately prevailed among the commercial classes has affected many important branches of the revenue; but her Majesty trusts the time is not far distant when, under the blessing of Divine Providence, the commerce and industry of the United Kingdom will have resumed their wonted activity."

The Commissioners having retired, and the House cleared of all but members, the Earl Strafford was introduced by the Earl Fitzwilliam and Earl Spencer when he took the oaths and his seat, upon being raised to the dignity of an Earl; the Earl was introduced by the Usher of the Black Rod, and was attended by Sir Charles Young, the Garter King at Arms; the Duke of Norfolk, as Hereditary Earl Marshal, and Lord Willoughby de Eresby, as Lord Great Chamberlain.

The swearing in of Peers was again resumed, and continued up till near five o'clock. Amongst the Peers then sworn were the Duke of Buccleuch, the Bishop of Exeter, the Earl of Suffolk, Lord Denman, &c.

After a short interval, the woolsack was again resumed by the Earl of Shaftesbury as their colleck, when upwards of 100 Peers had assumed their places, the greater majority present having seated themselves on the Opposition side of the House. Amongst those in the House were the Duke of Cambridge, the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of Buccleuch, the Duke of Richmond, the Earl of Jersey, Lords Stanley, Lyndhurst, Brougham, &c., together with all the Ministers having seats in the House, with the exception of the Lord Chancellor.

The noble Lord Address, the Earl of Yarborough, was in his place, attired in the full dress of a Deputy Lieutenant (red); while Lord Elphinstone the seconder, appeared in a blue uniform.

The Earl of Yarborough then rose and said—My Lords, I can assure your Lordships that although this is not the first time I have had occasion to address an assembly something similar to that of your Lordships, still I feel so inadequate to the task I have undertaken, that I am constrained to ask that indulgence which your Lordships, I have no doubt, are in the usual habit of kindly affording to members who address your Lordships for the first time. I trust your Lordships will feel, that in a new position when one attempting to address your Lordships must labour under some difficulties; for there are subjects touched upon in her Majesty's most gracious Speech, which require to be touched upon, as I think most delicately, by the person who has to move an Address in reply to that most gracious Speech, if, as I am most anxious should be the case upon the present occasion, he desires that the Address should receive the unanimous assent of your Lordships' House. Whatever opinion noble Lords may have formed upon the conduct of her Majesty's Government upon a late occasion, every one must feel that, considering the circumstances in which the commercial affairs of the country were placed, the giving the power to advance further capital to the country was the best step which could have been taken. The commercial distress was greater than had existed in the country for a very considerable number of years; and I sincerely trust the measures of her Majesty's Government will alleviate the distress consequent upon such a derangement in the accustomed stream of commerce. Many of your Lordships may differ as to the cause of the distress. Some may attribute it to one, and others to the effect of a recent measure which received the sanction of the Legislature, more commonly known as Peel's Act. Some may attribute it—and with those I shall certainly agree, for I think it undeniably the case—to the great amount of money required to purchase food for the country during the past year. No doubt there have been other causes, and for some of them the Parliament itself does not stand wholly free from blame. Legislation has been put to the purposes of those works as could not be drawn from the legitimate profits of the country. And, my Lords, consequently from the large amount of money required for the purchase of food, came the expenditure sanctioned for railways, not it greatly exceeded the abilities of the country. Upon referring, my Lords, to those returns which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) laid on the table of the House, I observed that under last session, only 400 miles of railway was in course of construction. Some may attribute it to the effect of a recent measure which received the sanction of the Legislature, more commonly known as Peel's Act. Some may attribute it—and with those I shall certainly agree, for I think it undeniably the case—to the great amount of money required to purchase food for the country during the past year. No doubt there have been other causes, and for some of them the Parliament itself does not stand wholly free from blame. Legislation has been put to the purposes of those works as could not be drawn from the legitimate profits of the country. And, my Lords, consequently from the large amount of money required for the purchase of food, came the expenditure sanctioned for railways, not it greatly exceeded the abilities of the country. Upon referring, my Lords, to those returns which the noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) laid on the table of the House, I observed that under last session, only 400 miles of railway was in course of construction. Some may attribute it to one, and others that the expenses to which I was subjected in the present state of Ireland were such, that in the course of the last half year, although my property was in a district which could not be called distressed, I have not received a single shilling from that property. (Hear.) I speak not now of the distressed districts, but one in which considerable care and much money were expended. I speak now of a comparatively comfortable tenantry, of a well-disposed tenantry, and willing to do their utmost for themselves—and I ask your Lordships, then, what must be the state of the landlords in the distressed districts, where their sole reliance is in the payments of their rents, and whom you now call upon to support that tenantry? My Lords, it would be far better if there was a clause by which your property altogether; and it is only a sense of duty that retains many of them upon their property. My Lords, when I speak of the present state of Ireland, I must say that it is worse than a state of civil war, and dreadful it is to find the people enlisted in the strife one against the other—connections, neighbours, and friends, all engaged in an open struggle, and meeting one another with arms in their hands. My Lords, the best landlords —those who have expended their time, and labour, and money—who have scrupulously sacrificed everything for the purpose of discharging their duty—who have sacrificed the comforts of civilised life, for such they must do in certain parts of Ireland, in order to do their duty to their tenants and dependents—those men, many of them I could name, who are members of your Lordships' House, are besieged within their own houses, and incapable of moving beyond their own demesnes; are forbidden to go and defending their houses and gardens, and are actually prisoners within them, and with the knowledge throughout the country that their names are on the "black list." (Hear, hear.) My Lords, these men are not deterred -they endeavour to execute their duty; and they hope by their sufferings to enlist your sympathies in their behalf. One by one we see those proscribed men cut off by the hands of the assassin. (Hear, hear.) They wait till that slow but certain hand, against which no precautions can protect them, will assail them unprepared, or if protected, if subjected to the espionage of the police, whether resorted to the cottage of the poor man, or to the house of God, or to the board of guardians, for the purpose of doing what in them lies to mitigate the sufferings of the poor, one by one they fall victims to the blow of the assassin, which they have foreseen—of which they have been publicly forewarned. (Hear, hear.) Some of them, perhaps, in the bosom of their family—perhaps even the blow may fall, as fall it did, in a humble quarter, on the unoffending wife, who rushed forward and opposed her own body between the husband and the murderer—perhaps in open day, in the face of the whole community, and with the knowledge and connivance of half the country, the best, bravest, and most unreproachable men are the victims to the disgrace of a civilised community, cut off by the hand of the assassin. (Hear.) This is the state of things with which you have to deal in Ireland. My Lords, this country is disgraced. I do not fear, by using grievous terms, to describe in this country, thank God, the sympathy of the whole country is in favour of the victim of assassination. (Hear, hear.) The support of the whole country is awakened to vindicate the law. (Hear, hear.) The whole country is arm'd in favour, in all events, to the vengeance of the law the perpetrator of these nefarious actions. One universal feeling prevails in favour of the vindication of the law, the punishment of crime, and the repression of outrage. (Hear, hear.) But, my Lords, that is not the case in Ireland. (Hear, hear.) Be it timidity, or some other cause, there no hand is raised to stay the deed: but, worse than that, no voice is raised after it is committed.

[illegible] ment of railroads. Such an amount of money was sanctioned to be

[illegible] ment of railroads. Such an amount of money was sanctioned to be

My Lords, I approach a far more painful and more serious question than even this. That shall be forbidden entering upon such painful details, but they are forced upon me by the manner in which the circumstances of Ireland have been brought forward in her Majesty's Speech; and, I think there is no subject which more imperatively demands or justifies the immediate attention of Parliament. I speak with all respect of the Roman Catholic clergy. I believe that, most all men of education, they are, on the main, pious and well disposed individuals indefatigable in the discharge of their religious duties—in devoting themselves to their flocks, and in sparing no pains nor toil in those offices which they believe to be their duty to discharge. Having said this, I think it would be a crime to conceal the expression of my opinion, that, however the Roman Catholic clergy, as a body, may be desirous of repressing and discouraging outrages, the Roman Catholic clergy, as a body, do not lend themselves even to the support of the law. (Loud cheers.) My Lords, I believe perhaps it may be a natural but I believe that there is kind of rivalry of authority with regard to criminal offences in Ireland between the clergy and the law. I believe that the sacredness of confession is carried to a degree dangerous to the civil government and to the peace of the country. This I will say—that although I have heard of many denunciations against Informers—and Informer in Ireland means any man who joins in bringing offenders to justice; prosecutors, witnesses, all are classed under that name—and while against informers there have been denunciations from the sacred altar where, then and I should wish to hear, I would wish to have given me the greatest possible gratification to hear—a declaration made, either publicly or privately, by pastoral letter, by private recommendation, or by authentic declaration, in the hearing of God or outside the threshold, that it was the bounden duty of every member of the community not only to abstain from crime himself, but to denounce the guilty before the tribunals which ought be guilty of premeditated crime. (Cheers.) My Lords, I never heard of such a declaration, and I do believe, speaking with all respect of their merits, which I do not deny, that the Roman Catholic clergy would in Ireland denounce from the altar those who have been the support of the law, by recommending and enforcing as a solemn duty the denunciation to the civil authority of crimes which they know to be premeditated, but which crimes afterwards be accomplished. I must say, without any wish to crime to any one of the clergy worse motives than those of imprudence, that smooth expression of assent I have seen addressed to perhaps a too excitable peasantry denunciations of cases of crime, which, if not premeditated, were the result of [illegible] —(hear, hear)—which denunciations could hardly fail of stimulating to acts of violence that excitable population. One most melancholy instance was followed within a few days by the assassination of whom the priest had asked from the altar whether such a man deserved to live? (Hear, hear.) Her Majesty's Speech holds forth certain expectations that some measure will be asked for, for the repression of these crimes by them, in my own name, in the names of my noble friends around me, and I am sure I may say in the name of England (hear, hear), in the name of humanity, in the name of civilisation, for those measures be cheerfully granted. (Loud cheers.) Let us not fear or fear a loss of support from following such a course—let no fear of being taxed with inconsistency, turn you from your duty. Throw yourselves upon the generosity upon the justice of those you govern. Tell them, you will repress crime from us no unworthy opposition no unworthy taint. (Hear, hear.) Believe me, you shall receive from us no if nothing, no hesitating, no ambiguous support. (Hear.) It is you who are responsible for the safety of Ireland, and you and you are above all constitutional theories. They are the foundation, the basis the main bond of al. constitutions and all rights. You, the Ministers, are charged with the maintenance of those rights. You demand what sacrifices you will from the Irish landlords. Compel them to discharge their duties, but, in God's name, protect them and their helpless dependants from the dark and deadly assassin. I recollect years and years ago, I stood down almost for expressing an opinion which I entertain at this moment as strongly as I ever entertained it, that the law in Ireland must be feared before it can be loved—it must be looked up to for protection, and as a check to evil-disposed men, before the Irish people will bow to its authority. I give to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland my cordial meed of praise; I believe that to the extent to which he has yet gone, and he has exercised the powers intrusted to him with fidelity and vigour. But, the greater the fidelity and vigour which he has displayed, the more clear and manifest is the proof that the existing powers of the law are insufficient, and that further powers are wanting. Upon you, the Government, rests the responsibility of asking for those powers. My Lords, I will not believe that time or the other House of Parliament—I will not believe that the representatives of this kingdom, whose prime object must be to protect the people, and maintain the security of life and property—I will not believe that in either House of Parliament you will find any resistance to granting to your discretion, subject to your responsibility, the exercise of any powers which you may deem necessary. Earl Grey, as sound a constitutional Whig as any noble Lord whom I see opposite, did not hesitate to ask for the powers necessary to put down what he had in view, and I trust you will not hesitate to ask for full and sufficient powers. Should Parliament deny you, on Parliament be the responsibility. (Hear, hear.) My Lords, the subject on which I have just adverted you is of such vital interest, that I hardly know how to advert to those of minor importance. I find in her Majesty's Speech, in reference to foreign affairs, a statement that her Majesty's relations with the Court of Rome, by the advice of those by whom she is surrounded, have been of the most friendly character, and that the purpose of resuming peace to Switzerland. I only wish that her Majesty's Government could promise to Parliament a speedy termination to the hostilities in that country. In making of our foreign relations, it is somewhat extraordinary that no allusion should have been made to the state of the war now going on between the United States and Mexico (as we understood). With regard to the internal affairs of all foreign countries, my humble advice to your Lordships and to her Majesty's Government, is to interfere as little as possible. Last year I took the liberty of calling attention to the affairs of Portugal, and of remonstrating against the proposed intervention. My remonstrance was disregarded—an armed intervention took place. The effusion of blood was stopped, no doubt, and the civil war put an end to: but you undertook at the same time a task in which, as we told you, you would fail—namely, to guarantee the performance of certain acts on certain conditions. My Lords, I ask you, have you been able to fulfil these conditions? (Hear, hear.) Has the Sovereign of Portugal implicitly followed the advice of those by whom alone her Throne could have been saved? Or is the result this—that, whereas you have taken upon yourselves the anomalous duty of Minister of the Interior in Portugal, the consequence really is, after a system of intrigue, violence, and corruption in the election of the Cortes, the restoration, under British influence, of that Ministry to Portugal in whose oppression and tyrannical conduct was owing the rebellion which you put down. I have nothing to say against Senor Cabral. If the Portuguese people desire him for their Minister, in God's name let them have him; but what I complain of is, that this country should intermeddle in the affairs of Portugal, and undertake a task in itself impossible, the result of which has been just as was predicted. I am surprised that the State of Italy should not have been adverted to in this part of her Majesty's Speech relating to foreign affairs, for I hold the civil war now raging in Switzerland of infinitely less importance as compared with the struggle now maintained between ascendatic principles in that country where a revolution is going on which threatens the balance of power in Europe, in which we are ranged on one side a most liberal and enlightened Prince in all civil matters, but a most arbitrary one, as I conceive, in all of a spiritual kind. I know not what the Government are doing in this case, and I hope they are abstaining altogether—I hope they are doing nothing. But on an occasion like the present, it might have been decorous at least to have alluded to it. I hope there is no truth in the reports which have appeared in the newspapers from time to time, that a member of her Majesty's Government—a member of the Cabinet—I hope their is no truth in the reports that Lord Minto has taken any part in this struggle, either one way or another, or has expressed publicly, or in any way, his own opinions, or still more the opinions of her Majesty's Government, upon the subject, or that any member of the Government has, indirectly or directly, given any opinion whatever as to the success or the result of that struggle, or that the Government are in the slightest degree committed by any interference on the part of their agent which might be inconsistent with the obligations of former treaties. With reference to the concluding paragraph with respect to foreign affairs, I confess that such was my geographical ignorance that my first conception of the Republic of the Equador possessed any ports or navy, by means of which they would be able to assist in the suppression of the Slave Trade. No doubt, however, the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies will dry this important treaty on the table (laughter), much the happy, was not one of the reasons why Parliament was called together. (Laughter.) Your policy is the suppression of the Slave Trade. Take care what you do. Take care, by taking off the support of the Slave Trade, that you do not give a stimulus to a discussion which might show that the suppression of the Slave Trade on the left hand was carried out with its encouragement and support on the right (Hear, hear.) I believe that the reports of the passing of the Act for the admission of slave-grown sugar received in the Havannah with bonfires and illuminations; that they raised the price of slaves, that it gave an additional stimulus. And my firm conviction and belief is this, that had the treaty between the two the restoration of the prohibition in the markets of this country of slave-grown sugar, and the total withdrawal of all your squadron, maintained at such an expense and loss of life on the coast of Africa—if I had to choose between the two, I should regard as far more effectual, far more innocent, far less ruinous, far less destructive, the total withdrawal of your squadron, and the restoration of the former system than the continuance of the present system. And now an important question in the Speech of her Majesty. I allude to the omission of any notice of one of the greatest sentences, if not the very greatest source, of that distress with which the Speech is filled. There may have been temporary causes, there may have been rash speculation on the part of our merchants; but there is not a man among you bold enough to get up and say that the last blow which overthrew the great commercial houses connected with the colonies, and by your own act, placed on an equality with regard to duty, but on a frightful footing of equality as to all other circumstances, your own colonial producers of free-labour sugar and the slave-labour producers of Brazil and Cuba, that that was not a great cause to deal with that question? My Lords, I read the other day—I read with pain and grief the speech of Sir Charles Grey to the House of Assembly of Jamaica, in which, speaking in the name of the Government, and in opposition against his own honest convictions, with the pain of those whom he was addressing before him in the face, he says in effect, "What would you have? When protection was withdrawn from corn, protection could not be maintained for sugar." And now the West Indians say, and say with some reason —"If we are to have no advantages in the markets of England. If our produce is to receive no preference if we are to have no favour in consideration of the difficulties and the obstacles thrown in our way by your Legislation, and not in the way of our rivals, at all events, leave us to our fate. Withdraw your advantages at all events let us send our produce in the cheapest manner and at the lowest rates." Thus it has happened that the protection to corn having been withdrawn, the protection to sugar also ceased; and the protection to sugar having ceased, your sugar manufacturers join in the ignorant and dangerous cry that for the protection of the mercantile interests of this country you must sweep away the Navigation Laws. (Loud cries of "hear, hear.") But my inference from the course of your past policy and its results is directly the opposite to that. Undoubtedly it the principles of Free-Trade are to prevail in your navigation; if bring in the cheapest market and selling in the dearest, if to be your only rule, while you set aside all considerations of maritime superiority, of national supremacy and national honour, then you will do wisely to go in your downward course and to lower yourself to the utmost possible extent. My Lords, I believe it would be a suicidal policy for a country like ours, which must depend for its command of the necessaries and the luxuries of life, not on the narrow precincts of its ocean-surrounded island, but on the extent of its foreign traffic, and its possession of that portion of the world over whose commercial relations it exercises a paramount influence—I believe it would be a suicidal policy for such a country to abolish those Navigation Laws which form the nursery of its commerce. (Hear, hear.) In the opinion of some persons, however, we must bow before a theory, and sacrifice to become a secondary power. My inference, on the contrary, from the consequences of your past course, is, that you must now at length to see the ruin to which that course is driving you, and that before it be too late, you have enough to arrest your downward progress, and fit be possible retrace your dangerous step. (Hear, hear.) I find that we have now to deal with a deficiency of means to meet the national expenditure. But I can find in her Majesty's Speech no statement of the manner in which her Majesty's Government intend to meet that deficiency. I see that her Majesty expresses a hope that the time is not distant when, under the blessing of Divine Providence, the commerce and industry of the United Kingdom shall again be crowned with activity. My Lords, I earnestly pray that that hope may speedily be realised. But I believe that if you desire that the industry of the country should flourish, you must pursue a course of policy calculated to promote and encourage that industry. I do not think that that is the course you have of late been pursuing. I will take this opportunity of expressing a hope that there is no truth in the report to the effect that it is intended to state that it has been circulated that, in the distresses and difficulties to which her Majesty's Government are exposed, a ruinous and desperate attempt will be made to diminish the pressure of distress by a hand across the Income Tax; and not only to continue a tax in the first instance temporary in its character, but to increase and extend that tax, with aggravating circumstances, in a manner into which I will not now enter. I hope her Majesty's Government have not that intention. I trust that they will rather feel it their duty, and that, if they do not, Parliament will feel it its duty, strenuously to resist any attempt to impose such a tax on the country in a time of profound distress, calculated to prevent and encourage that industry. I do not think that that is the course you have of late been pursuing. I will take this opportunity of expressing a hope that there is no truth in the report to the effect that you will propose ember, he should move that a select committee be appointed to inquire and report on the means by which the Parliament of Ireland was dissolved, the effects which that event produced upon the state of Ireland, as well upon the labourers engaged in husbandry as on those employed in manufactures, as also its effects on the agriculturists and operatives of England, together with the probable consequences to the United Kingdom at large of a continuance of the Legislative Union between the two countries.

IMPEACHMENT OF LORD PALMERSTON.—Mr. ANSTEY gave notice that he should take an early opportunity of moving for a return of certain papers connected with the administration of Lord Palmerston, from 1830 to the present time, and that upon those papers he intended to found a charge against a Noble Lord on the Treasury bench of high crimes and misdemeanours. (A laugh.)

SALE OF MAR.—Dr. BOWRING gave notice of motions on the administration of the criminal law in the Isle of Man, and on the subject of a decimal coinage.

MR. HOUSEMAN gave notice of a motion on the subject of the course of proceedings pursued by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

ADJOURNED DEBATES.—Mr. BROTHERTON gave notice of a motion to the effect that, when the adjournment of a debate is moved at any time after twelve o'clock, the debate shall be adjourned to the following day without any question being put thereon.

THE QUEEN'S SPEECH.—ADDRESS OF THE COMMONS.

The SPEAKER had, he said, to report to the House that he had that day attended the House of Peers; that a Commission under the Great Seal had appointed certain Commissioners to read her Majesty's Speech to both Houses; that the Marquis of Lansdowne had read the Speech to both Houses of Parliament, of which he had obtained a copy. He then read the Queen's Speech. [See Lords' report.]

Mr. HEYWOOD had, he said, now to move that an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, thanking her for the gracious Speech which she had been pleased to address to both Houses. In making this motion, it first became necessary for him to request that indulgence which the House usually accorded on occasions like the present (hear), and which was the more needed by him, and in his case, as it was not in his power to congratulate them on the state of prosperity, but rather to express his regret at the state of their commercial position, and when their trading classes were in a state of great depression, and when many were suffering from undue speculations in railways. Such had been the character impressed upon this age, by speculations in railways, that this might well be designated as "the iron age." Nothing could be more extraordinary than what had been done as regarded railways in this country. It amounted in all to no less a sum than £295,000,000. There had been £101,000,000 paid on bonds and shares, and there were engagements contracted to the amount of £194,000,000. These enormous sums expended, or about to be expended in one object could not but cause a crisis, and to this were to be added the deficient harvest of last year, the failure of the potato crop, and other unhappy and unforseen circumstances. These, altogether, could not but cause great poverty, produce great embarrassment, and inflict great misery upon the country. (Hear.) Its effects, he could say from experience, had been felt in Lancashire, where the cotton trade had greatly decreased, and where, in 1845, the average weekly consumption was 30,000 bales; in 1846, 31,000 bales; and this year, the average weekly consumption was only 20,000 bales. These facts were then very conspicuous in the East Indies, over-speculation in corn, and with these a vast number of causes, all combining to cause a depression in trade, and a consequent deficiency of money. (Hear, hear.) Matters at length came to such a point, that there was a panic in the commercial world—money was not to be found for the discount of bills, and it was felt that some time must elapse before a sufficiency could be found. At that time, the noble Lord at the head of the Government and the Chancellor of the Exchequer had recommended to the Bank of England to enlarge their discounts, and he believed that if some such course had not been taken, still more serious consequences must have ensued. (Hear.) The result of their interference, he believed, had been advantageous. By means of their letter, of 25th October, confidence was in a certain degree restored. He might mention as a proof of the condition in which the country was placed at this time, that in Newcastle there had been a run upon the bank; that the managers at the bank had the good sense to meet it; that intelligence was sent by the electric telegraph to London, and an express that brought a large amount of bullion from Leeds to Newcastle. He only mentioned this fact to show what was the amount of alarm that prevailed. Happily, however, there had been no infringement of the Bank Charter Act. By that act a certain rate was required, and the Bank had, on the preceding day, reduced its discounts to 7 per cent, and in a short time he hoped it would be at liberty to resume its arrangements in the ordinary course of business. (Hear, hear.) The state of Ireland was alluded to in the Queen's Speech. It was not necessary to inform the House that atrocious crimes had been perpetrated in Ireland; that these must be put an end to some way or another; that the means must be afforded to her Majesty's Government to suppress crime, and punish the perpetrators of it. He thought, too, that remedial measures were required for Ireland, and he was happy to see an allusion made to the improvement of the social condition of the people; and he also thought that the Lord-Lieutenant was to be commended for the admirable system he had pursued in Ireland. (Hear.) The Lord-Lieutenant had turned the attention of the agricultural interest to the future cultivation of crops, and through his 'means lectures were instructing the peasantry as to the improvement of the crops grown by them, while already there had been an improvement in the green crops. (Hear, hear.) The House, he was sure, could not but rejoice to hear that the foreign relations of this country were in such a state as to enable her Majesty to be able to keep them at home to maintain tranquillity in which a greater respect was felt for England than in Switzerland, and he was sure that the sympathy shown by England for Switzerland would tend much to restore peace and harmony to that country. (Hear.) As the Speech from the Throne, he was sure, would be glad to hear that her Majesty had concluded a treaty with the Republic of the Equador, which, although a small State, was one the co-operation of which would be of great importance to the suppression of slavery; for under the treaty her Majesty's ships were to have power to search their vessels. The House, too, he was sure, would agree in the propriety of the course that was to be pursued with regard to the Navigation Laws. He was sure the House could not but think it proper that these laws should come under their consideration; and he believed that they would well prepare their minds by reading the amazing work written on the report of the Committee, by the honourable member for Stoke-on-Trent (Mr. Ricardo). No one, he was sure, could doubt but that the health of towns was a subject that pressed for consideration, and especially on account of the possibility of there again appearing among them the fatal epidemic which had formerly visited them. He was sure there were no means so certain for staying the cholera as attention being given to the health of towns, to good sewerage, to an abundant supply of water, and to the cleanliness of the habitations of those dwelling in towns. (Hear.) The House was aware that her Majesty had in her gracious Speech alluded to the condition of the working classes, and had bestowed her commendations upon them for the patient and exemplary manner in which they had borne the privations to which they had been subjected. (Hear.) This was a subject on which he could speak from his own personal knowledge of the manufacturing districts. The working classes had suffered much—they had been thrown out of work—they had been working short time—they had been much afflicted—and yet their patience and their fortitude under their sufferings were such as to entitle them for their conduct to the respect of that House. (Cheers.) He would speak, too, of the pleasure that had been excited and the joy that had been diffused throughout Ireland when her Majesty visited it, on her return from Scotland. (Cheers.) He now begged to move that an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, for the gracious Speech which she had been pleased to make in that House. He then read the Address, which was an echo to the Speech.

Mr. C. S. ADAIR, in rising to second the motion, craved the indulgence of the House, and for the same reason as his hon. friend; and he also claimed it on the ground of his inexperience, and lest it should lead him to do injury in their eyes to the cause which he endeavoured to advocate. (Cheers.) Those who had witnessed the state of distress in this country must have felt, and indeed, during the late stoppage of trade, must be able fully to appreciate how much praise was due to her Majesty when she authorised her Ministers to do that which might intinge an Act regulating their trading affairs, but which proved, as a nation, should be abated, and that where they fancied was their greatest strength, they should be made to feel their weakness; but, learning this lesson, they never could despair, for they had been blessed with the indomitable energy of the British people, and how well they struggled out of every difficulty, and conquered every obstacle. (Hear, hear, and cheers.) It would afford the House, he was sure, unmixed gratification to learn that another link had been stricken from the chain which bound the limbs of the slave. He conceived that there could be but one opinion with respect to the advantages, the moral and physical results, of the treaty which had been concluded with the Republic of the Equador for the suppression of the slave-trade. As his honourable friend had told them, under the previous arrangements a kind of chicanery was carried on, and which, so long as Great Britain asserted her great privilege of being the friend of the slave, must have interfered with her exertions to a considerable degree. (Hear). At a time when we felt the greatest pride in the weight and importance which this country had attained in the councils of the world, it was then also most especially that we were called upon to interpose friendly advice in the affairs of another state—might more so, when that state, by its constitutional and political arrangements, claimed our sympathy and support; and when too, unhappily, its internal condition was such as to need and require the friendly advice of those who were intelligent in its welfare. He alluded to Switzerland. It was a terrible thing to the friends of constitutional freedom to sought borne down by the sway of the invader. It was terrible, even when it was obscured by the smoke of successful battle; but it was yet more terrible, when the blood of brethren was shed in domestic quarrels upon their own soil. (Hear, hear). And he might infer from the gracious Speech of her Majesty—he spoke as an individual member of that House—he might infer, from the assurance that her Majesty had given, "that she looked with confidence to the maintenance of the general peace of Europe," that the better day that was dawning would not be overclouded by any event upon new kingdoms admitted into the great confederacy of a free people. He might infer that those people who had done honour to their Sovereigns as Sovereigns had done honour to them, might be permitted to exercise within their own frontiers the undoubted right of deciding what their constitutional and municipal arrangements should be. The next question contained in the Speech from the Throne to which he would advert was, that of the health of towns. That was a subject of the utmost importance; and he was of opinion that the least possible delay should be permitted to intervene ere they adopted and carried into full execution some measures for its improvement. Already disease was making great ravages amongst the inhabitants of our large towns, and he feared that before a long period had elapsed they would have to make preparations for the reception of another and a ghastlier visitant. There was, indeed, too much reason to believe that the cholera was on its way towards this country, and but short time might be allowed us to make preparations against its further progress. (Hear.) There was another and a leading topic contained in her Majesty's Speech, on which he should speak with a sense of deep oppression under the great and overpowering interest of the subject. The Speech from the Throne told them of "sufferings which afflicted the labouring classes in the manufacturing districts of Great Britain, and also in many parts of Ireland." Now, whatever measures might be in preparation, or were rendered necessary by the process of events in Ireland, this at least they knew, that, to render its disorders curable, it must be made secure—(cheers from the Conservative benches)—that in fact the state had a right to demand an account of the blood of every one, even of the meanest of its subjects. (Renewed cheers.) Though he knew the many good qualities of the Irish people, yet when he reflected on the scenes that had been recently enacted there, and when he heard of the horrible assassination which was so frequently taking place there, his heart was positively sickened. (Hear, hear.) In the old disastrous times, from which he for one would never raise the veil, except perchance to select some example for admiration—in those disastrous times, horrible as the outrages were that had been committed, still Christian charity might from time to time find some palliation, some excuse to urge, in behalf of the wretched men who committed the crimes which made them the objects of such abhorrence. Christian charity might not have been improperly exercised in endeavouring to account for these offences, though not to extenuate them. In those days, too, now happily passed away of unmitigated political hatreds, there was no property-qualification there, his hon. friend the member for Limerick might have informed them, his heart was positively sickened. (Hear, hear.) In the old disastrous times, from which he for one would never raise the veil, except perchance to select some example for admiration—in those disastrous times, horrible as the outrages were that had been committed, still Christian charity might from time to time find some palliation, some excuse to urge, in behalf of the wretched men who committed the crimes which made them the objects of such abhorrence. Christian charity might not have been improperly exercised in endeavouring to account for these offences, though not to extenuate them. In those days, too, now happily passed away of unmitigated political hatreds, there was no property-qualification there, his hon. friend the member for Limerick might have informed them, his heart was not yet quite withered in this country, but at the present time, when the Legislature had wisely, justly, and humanely decreed, that the Irish people should find provision upon the Irish soil so large as provision could be supplied, the agrarian and political strifes and animosities were allayed, that then the gigantic figure of monetary murder should stalk forth, was horrible—it was astounding. (Hear, hear.) He believed that these frightful crimes disgraced the sister country, might be checked and repressed by the ordinary powers of the law; but, speaking as an individual member of this House, he ventured to say that the perpetrators of these crimes had a fiendish hilarity when that guilt entailed upon the land. They must have continually brought before them the fact that there were duties as well as rights among all classes of society—a lesson which was, perhaps, occasionally forgotten. They must be told that the Government would, as far as the Government could, abate this moral pestilence and this physical evil: that it would stand forward and protect the meanest as well as the greatest of its subjects against the assassin's blow. (Hear, hear.) With regard to the remedial measures which would be hereafter submitted to the House, it was not his province to anticipate them, or the nature of the remedies which they might be expected to meet with at their hands. But whatever the repression of crime must come a restoration of confidence between man and man; for it would be unmeet in him to attempt to conceal that there was not that confidence which ought to reign between man and man. Confidence, like all noble things, was slow of growth; but he trusted we were on the march towards it, and that measures would be proposed and carried that were calculated to tranquillise the country. Confidence being restored, then would come the period for developing the great and inexhaustible resources of the country. But from his experience of Ireland, he would warn the House not to expect too rapid results from any measures which might be introduced, and thereby avoid discouragement. (Hear, hear.) The duty of the British Senate was a great and glorious one. It had to redress a wrong in a country that should be a rival only in constitutional progress; and in performing it they must call for the assistance of all classes, from the highest to the lowest. The English people had a great duty to perform in Ireland. It was there to be found in office and no exertion that they were not willing to make for improving the condition of Ireland. And, believing that that object was attainable by the exercise of a large, generous, comprehensive, and intelligible policy, and believing also that such would be the policy adopted by this House, he begged leave to second the Address.

The Address was then read, and the question put from the chair.

Mr. GRATTAN was compelled by an imperative sense of duty to object to the address which had just been proposed. He determined, if there were any chance of better means of probing the wounds of Ireland than by the soldier's bayonet. He reprobated the atrocious crimes which had been recently perpetrated in Ireland, and felt that that was the first duty of Parliament to propose an energetic defence of his country by the deadly weapons wielded by some of its unworthy sons. The members for Ireland were not of opinion that enough had been done to relieve the distress of Ireland. They did not believe that the Poor-Law had succeeded—they knew that it had failed—they were aware that six boards of guardians had either resigned or been superseded—they believed that the property of Ireland was gone; and, therefore, he determined to propose an amendment calling for further relief. He then favoured the House with a glowing picture in his own peculiar style of the distress which now prevailed in Ireland, attributing it partly to absenteeism, partly to the electment system, but principally to the union. He wished to see a solid union between Great Britain and Ireland—not an union between wealth and poverty, productive of no amalgamation between the two countries—not a mere union of parchment—but an union of hearts and interests. After alluding to the overthrow of Sir R. Peel's Government, because he had introduced coercive measures without any measures of relief, he told the members of the present Administration that he would give them a coercive act now, provided that they would limitit to the counties in which outrages were committed, and would accompany it with some large and practical measure. He concluded by moving an amendment declaratory of the necessity incumbent upon Government to devise immediate measures to avert pestilence and famine from a large number of her Majesty's subjects in Ireland, after which the address should propose something more than the mere vulgar expedient of the bayonet. Yes, coercion was a vulgar expedient, and perfectly futile, as had been proved by the history of the last fifty years. He had preceded to paint the prevalence of crime in Ireland to three causes:—1st. The universal poverty and distress of the people; 2ndly, the unfortunate state of the relations between landlords and tenants; and 3rdly, the unfortunate want of confidence in Ireland during the present conduct of the Executive. He next vindicated the people of Ireland from the charge of being assassins and murderers, and denied that there was anything in the Celtic blood which rendered them more prone to such deeds than in Scotland or England. He, therefore, could not accede to any Coercion Bill, until the Government had first inquired into the social evils of the country, and had afterwards done its duty by providing for the relief of the distress which was sufficient to meet the present outrages, if that law were systematically and effectively enforced, which as yet it never had been by the present Government. After showing that the system of judicial rents in Ireland was fundamentally bad, the police system was equally inoperative, and that the management of the executive department of Government in Dublin was very defective, he called on the Government and Parliament to do justice to Ireland by settling the existing relations between landlords and tenants, by feeding the starving, by not letting the population die of want, and by reorganizing the executive Government in Ireland. After an explanation by Mr. ADAIR, and a complete explanation by Mr. ROCHE,

Mr. DRUMMOND suggested to Mr. Grattan the propriety of withdrawing his amendment, and called upon Ministers to muster courage to put in force their repeatedly promised of doing justice to Ireland. He, in England and in Scotland the Established Church was the church of the majority in both countries; and he could not see on what principle of justice the Established Church in Ireland should be the church of the minority. The House would not, after mature deliberation between landlords and tenants, by feeding the starving, by not letting the population die of want, and by reorganizing the executive Government in Ireland. After an explanation by Mr. ADAIR, and a complete explanation by Mr. ROCHE,

Mr. DRUMMOND suggested to Mr. Grattan the propriety of withdrawing his amendment, and called upon Ministers to muster courage to put in force their repeatedly promised of doing justice to Ireland. He, in England and in Scotland the Established Church was the church of the majority in both countries; and he could not see on what principle of justice the Established Church in Ireland should be the church of the minority. The House would not, after mature deliberation; but every vote of money would be inefficacious if it did not adopt the same principle of justice in all the three kingdoms, instead of making a difference between the people of Great Britain on the one side and Ireland on the other, with respect to their respective church establishments. Justice to Ireland required that its starving people should be kept alive; but then it must be by their own labour, and by that of no other people. He could not, and in Scotland he been effured that the Poor-Law in Ireland was a failure; the proof which Mr. Grattan had offered of that position only showed that the Irish proprietors did not like to carry it into execution. Justice to Ireland required that life should be preserved within it; and there would be no justice to Ireland until Thuggism was eradicated, and until the clerical instigators of it exercised their functions properly.

Sir GEORGE GREY felt himself bound on the part of the Government to oppose the amendment, as it was opposed to that spirit of self-reliance which all parties who wished for its regeneration were anxious to excite in Ireland. Because a necessity existed that relief should be extended to the starving population of Ireland last year, ought the people of that country to be encouraged this year in the belief that similar relief would again be extended to them? He denied that the Poor-Law had been a failure in Ireland; on the contrary, the exertions which had been made, in various parts of the country, to carry it into effect, fully justified the expectations of Parliament in passing that law, and the terms in which it had been spoken of in the Speech from the Throne. After entering into some details to prove this assertion, he observed that there was a large store of grain in the Government warehouses at the end of last year, and that Government would itself feel that store to meet any local emergency which might arise. He believed that there would be no occasion for any future advances of money to Ireland by the Government; though, on that point, he should not be able to speak with any confidence at the winter advanced. He declined alluding at present to the subject of crime in Ireland, as he should be called upon to enter into it fully on an early day, when he should have to ask for leave to bring in a bill for the better security of life in that country. He considered Mr. Roche to have volunteered very unnecessarily a defence of the people of Ireland. He had seen no statement that the Irish were a people of assassins; on the contrary, he had seen several statements which indicted him, and indeed every member of the Government, to believe that, in most parts of Ireland, life was as safe, and murder was as much abhorred, as in England. Mr. Roche had not done justice to the Government in his discussion on the remedial measures which ought to accompany coercion; for, in her most gracious Speech, her Majesty had recommended to the consideration of Parliament measures which, with due regard to the rights of property, were calculated to advance the social condition of the people, and tend to the permanent improvement of Ireland. Though a landlord and tenant bill was not specifically mentioned in the Queen's Speech, that subject had attracted the attention of the Lord Lieutenant, and would be brought forward as soon as possible. He concluded by expressing a hope that all measures for the benefit of Ireland would be discussed this session without any admixture of party spirit.

Mr. JOHN O'CONNELL regretted that he could not hold out a hope to Sir G. Grey that the Address would meet with that unanimity which he so much desired; for, after the present amendment was disposed of, there would be another proposed relating to the threatened measures of coercion. He then entered into a very detailed account of the distress of Ireland, and contended that her Majesty's Ministers would be greatly disappointed, if they expected, by their new Poor-Law, to save Ireland from that destruction. The distress was now much greater, and far more frightful, than it was last year; and something must be done at once to relieve it. It was said that Parliament was called upon to consider of an Indemnity Act, which was not wanted for the measures of Government with respect to the Bank. He hoped that it was not so; for it would be satisfactory to the people of Ireland to hear it avowed by Ministers that its increasing distress was the cause of summoning Parliament at this unusual season. He complained that Ministers had been but too speeks on the measures of coercion which they intended to propose. Why had they not been specific also as to their measures of relief? He deeply deplored the fact that Lord J. Russell had determined to coerce the people of Ireland before he had put his arm to the plough to remove the causes which gave rise to the crimes of that country. He asked Lord J. Russell to explain the causes of the change which had come over the spirit of his dream since he had delivered his celebrated speech on the state of Ireland eighteen months ago. In conclusion he called on Ministers to exercise to the utmost the ordinary law, but not to infringe on the Constitution, nor to call for extraordinary powers before they had proved that ordinary powers were insufficient.

Sir B. HALL had expected, after the speech of Sir G. Grey, that Mr. Grattan would have withdrawn his amendment, and still believed that he would have done so, had it not been for the strange speech just delivered by Mr. J. O'Connell. It was quite monstrous that Mr. J. O'Connell should say that England had done nothing for his country, when the people of England, as he showed at some length, had done everything in their power to relieve the pestilence and famine that last year prevailed in Ireland. Why, if we had done nothing, what had Mr. J. O'Connell been doing? Something worse than nothing. Had he not used, at every public meeting which he had attended, inflammatory language, which must have had an incentive to incondiarism and assassination? No wonder, then, that he was so anxious that no Coercion Bill should be passed, and that he had declared that "he would die on the floor of the House of Commons before such a bill were passed." He then took a review of the state to which Ireland had been reduced by the different agitators who now distracted it, and condemned their annual menace of bringing the question of Repeal before Parliament, without ever enforcing it, as one of the most monstrous pieces of political humbug which had ever been displayed before an admiring world. He fully believed that, had it not been for the exertions of Sir Robert Peel, and of the noble Lord the member for Stafford, the same game would have been played again by the Irish Repeal members this session. He then adverted to the amendment, which, in reality, was a call upon us to give more impetus to the Poor-Law. But the representatives of one of the largest English constituencies, that he would not grant a single farthing to the relief of the distress in Ireland, until he found that all the means of Ireland were exhausted.

Mr. M. O'CONNELL contended that the Irish members would be able to defeat the Coercion Bill now, as they had done in 1846, without the necessity of any person "dying on the floor."

Mr. S. CRAWFORD considered that the declaration of Sir G. Grey, that the Government intended to introduce a measure on the landlord and tenant question, was very far from satisfactory; for the very same declaration had been made last session, and yet nothing had been done. He complained of the neglect with which British statesmen and the British Legislature treated this important question, which was at the bottom of all the disorders of Ireland. As to the amendment, he thought that, by increasing the resources of Ireland to be sufficient for the relief of the people of that country, he should be the last man in the world to drain a single farthing from the hard-worked artizans of England for the purpose of relieving the people of Ireland from the discharge of those duties which their property entailed upon them.

Sir W. SOMERVILLE considered this amendment to be unnecessary, and hoped that Mr. Grattan would consent to withdraw it. He was forced to admit the existence both of distress and of crime in Ireland; but the crime was of a local character, and was confined to the counties of Limerick, Clare, Roscommon, Meath Queen's County, and Tipperary, and there was no reason, while it was condemning the misconduct of part of Ireland, not to forget the patience and abstinence from crime of the inhabitants of the western coast of Ireland, who had been visited with a calamity such as they had never before experienced before. He described the Ration Act as having perfectly succeeded; he explained the manner in which the New Poor Law had been put in operation in Ireland, and denied that it had been a failure.

Mr. S. O'BRIEN declared his intention of supporting the Address, and of waiting till he saw what the measures of Government were, before he ventured to condemn them. The evil which they had to deal with in Ireland was not a solitary crime, but solitary assassination, the result and connivance of the lower classes with the perpetrators of such outrages. As a proof of this, he detailed the circumstances which attended the attempted assassination of Mr. Bayly, and created great excitement in the House by an eloquent description of the refusal of the peasantry to give any assistance to that gentleman, in his frightful state of mutilation.

Mr. FEARGUS O'CONNOR observed that the object of calling Parliament together now was to give stability to the money-market, but that object would be defeated by the declarations of the Government respecting the state of Ireland. Coercion Bill after Coercion Bill had been proposed for Ireland, but no improvement of its social condition had followed any one of them. He advised the House to give the people of Ireland and a perpetuity tenure. That measure would throw the people of Ireland on their own resources, they would be able to support themselves, and to take the idlers off the land. He deprecated such speeches as that of Sir B. Hall, defended the conduct of Archbishop Laffan, and concluded by declaring that he would sit, sleep, and even die, in the House, in opposing coercive measures.

Mr. GRATTAN then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. HERRIES insisted that the commercial distress of the country, and the interference of the Government with the Bank for the purpose of relieving it, required other measures from those which the Administration than it had yet received in the course of the debate. The house ought to be informed whether Ministers intended to leave the Bank Act of 1844 without suspension during the period in which the distress was increasing into its opposition, or whether they intended to propose any temporary measure to neutralize the injurious effects which might arise from its continuance during a protracted inquiry.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER would, on Monday next, make the statement which Mr. Herries now required, and explain the views entertained by Government on this subject. Ministers had called Parliament together to give it an opportunity of considering their conduct; they did not intend to ask for any bill of indemnity for the step which they had taken, as no infringement of the law had taken place.

The Address was then agreed to without opposition, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS—WEDNESDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at four o'clock

Petitions were presented against the admission of Jews to Parliament. Amongst these, one was presented by Sir R. Inglis, from Oxford University; by Mr. Goulburn, from Cambridge University; and by Mr. Cardwell, from Liverpool. Petitions in favour of their admission were presented by Lord J. Russell, and other hon. members.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer laid on the table the correspondence between himself and the Bank of England, relative to the letter of license to supersede the Bank Act of 1844.

To a question from Mr. G. BANKES,

Lord J. RUSSELL said that no appointment had, as yet, been made to the Presidentship of the Poor-Law Commission, but that the Commissioners under the former Act were responsible for the administration of the law; and that her Majesty, by an order in Council, should appoint the new Commission.

Captain BARNE desired to be informed, if any step was taken by the Government to bring to trial the two Irish priests who had denounced from the altar the gentlemen who were, immediately after such denunciations, shot.

Sir W. SOMERVILLE replied, that no step had been taken in the matter.

In reply to a question from Mr. ANSTEY,

Lord J. RUSSELL stated that Mr. Stephens still remained in the Colonial Office, although absent on leave.

Mr. HUME gave notice, for this day week, to move that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Finance, to take into consideration the state of the revenue and the existing modes of taxation.

Mr. LABOUCHERE gave notice that on Friday he would move for a Committee to consider whether any alteration would be desirable in the mode of conducting the private business of the House.

To a question put by Lord A. LENNOX,

Mr. WARD read a despatch from Sir H. Seymour, distinctly contradicting the rumour which had gained currency, charging Sir C. Napier with having made use of his position at Lisbon to obtain arrears due to him by the Portuguese Government.

In reply to Mr. GLADSTONE,

Sir G. GREY promised that correspondence relative to New Zealand should be shortly laid on the table.

The usual sessional orders were agreed to without discussion.

On the bringing up of the Report on the Address,

Lord G. BENTINCK demanded to know if it was the intention of the Government to give a full explanation to the House of those circumstances which induced her Majesty to authorise her Ministers to advise the Bank of England to infringe the Act of 1844?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER said that, although personally ready to enter into the explanations at once, he considered it would be more convenient to postpone his statement to Tuesday next.

REPORT ON THE ADDRESS.

Mr. HEYWOOD moved that the report of the Committee on the Address be brought up.

Mr. OSBORNE wished, before the report was brought up, to make a few observations, which, he believed, would be quite in accordance with the forms of that House. Although, on ordinary occasions, he might not indulge in criticisms on those prolixuses of the session which were generally contrived to contain the smallest quantity of promise in the greatest quantity of words; yet, when he recollected the unparalleled state of affairs under which the Parliament had been called together, he should offer no apology to the House for the observations he was about to offer. When they considered the depression of commerce, the state of society in Ireland, when they looked at the state of the political horizon of Europe, it could hardly be considered presumptuous in a member of that House to address his attention to such a state of things. The depression of trade was not a local but an imperial question. If English trade were depressed the business were felt in Ireland. He would ask whether, if trade in England had last year been as depressed as it was at the present moment, a loan of ten millions would have been so freely granted to Ireland? He should never be satisfied until trade was put on a sure and steady basis. With respect to the currency, he thought that Government had acted wisely in granting a Committee, but at the same time he felt that unnecessary odium had been brought on his believed that throughout the whole period only three banks of issue had failed. He next came to European politics, and here he would remind the House that her Majesty expressed her deep concern at the state of affairs in Switzerland. But it should be remembered that the example we had set in the previous year by interfering in the affairs of Portugal, afforded a very good precedent for the autocrat of Austria's threatened interference with the late internal arrangements of Switzerland. He trusted, however, that the result of the exercise of the influence of her Majesty's Government with her allies, to restore peace to Switzerland, would be followed by a different kind of mediation to that which had been adopted with regard to Portugal, and that liberty of conscience would not be violated, nor the right of the majority of the federal states to rule the others be disputed. The next paragraph in the consideration the present state of Spain, Portugal, France, and Switzerland, really looked with confidence on the maintenance of the peace of Europe, he must, indeed, be blessed with a superabundance of confidence. In connection with this it would be his (Mr. Osborne's) duty, on a future day, to call the attention of Parliament to the present disgraceful state of our national defences. Upon the next paragraph—that which referred to the treaty with the Squadorr—all he would say was, that, of all the serious humbugs we had ever engaged in, our attempt to put down the slave trade was the worst; and the consequence of our interference was, to promote the horrors of the traffic, instead of preventing them. (Hear, hear.) He hoped, ere long, this question would be brought under the consideration of the House, in order that the people of this country might no longer be called upon to pay money which in effect only added to the horrors of the trade in slaves. He would now advert to the subject of Ireland, which formed a prominent part of the Royal Speech. On this subject he was sorry to observe in the debate of the previous night symptoms of an antagonistic spirit in the House, which could do no good, but might be productive of serious evils. In what observations he might have occasion to make he should endeavour to imitate the example of the right hon. Secretary for Ireland, whose tone and temper in speaking upon the subject deserved the highest credit. (Hear.) The House should remember that every indiscreet word spoken now might be heard, with consequences of which no one could foresee. With regard to that body of ecclesiastics whose conduct in the course of that debate had been adverted to, the great majority of them he knew to be sound in principle and exemplary in conduct; and, though, as in all such bodies, there were no doubt amongst them some designing men, it would be altogether a mistake to suppose that, as a body, they were not sincere and devoted friends of peace and order. This being his opinion, it was with great pain he had heard the speech of Archdeacon Lefan—which he did not, for a moment, defend—spoken of as it had been on the previous evening. Archdeacon Lefan was a man of excitable temperament (a laugh); and, he knew, that, for some time past, he had been in bad health, which might account, in some degree, for the expressions which he had used. ("Order," and laughter.) "Order!" he was sorry he knew that the hon. gentleman, on the previous Sunday, had preached from the altar a sermon, denouncing, in the strongest terms, assassination and outrage. (Hear.) He was glad that the Archdeacon spoke of Irish grievances in her Majesty's Speech, while lamenting the existence of such distress, "trusted that it would be materially relieved by the exertions which have been made to carry into effect the law of last session for the amendment of the Poor-Law." He was glad to find that the right hon. Secretary for Ireland had told them that he expected that, by means of the Poor-Law, three-fourths of the poverty of Ireland would be diminished, and that that measure, passed last session, had been productive of some effects. He believed that the law had worked well; but, by a recent indiscreet and hasty circular, which had issued from the Secretary's office in Dublin, not only the Poor-Law but the peace of the country, so far as the south of Ireland was concerned, had been imperilled.' Within the last three weeks a circular had been issued, ordering, in direct violation of the Act of Parliament itself, the rates declared valid, the Poor-Law to be paid into the hands of the Civil Paymaster in Dublin. It was almost impossible to describe the injurious effect of this order, and the difficulties it was calculated to throw in the way of the working of the law. In some parts of Tipperary the law was working well, though in some the rate was so high that it was almost impossible for the property to bear it. In his own district it had increased, since 1843, from £14,000 to £30,000. Her Majesty also stated, with satisfaction that the landed proprietors have taken advantage of the means placed at their disposal by the liberality of Parliament for the improvement of land." This was a most extraordinary paragraph to be put into her Majesty's Speech. True it was that many applications had been made for advances from the million loan; he believed in two instances only, had any advance been granted. One noble Lord having extensive estates in the south of Ireland, and who had devoted much of his time and attention to the improvement of the condition of the people, had applied for an advance of £20,000, but he had been unsuccessful, though he told him that, if an advance were made, it would be impossible to give employment to the people, or to improve the land. (Hear.) Under these circumstances, he thought it right to inquire of the Government whether there was any money in the country out of which these advances could be made? If civilization was to proceed in Ireland, the Government must, by some means or other, perform their part of the bargain into which they had entered, and not put the loan of money for the purpose. In discussing the next point in the Speech upon which he wished to touch—that which referred to the spirit of insubordination which had manifested itself in Ireland, "leading to an organized resistance to the legal rights," he should endeavour to forget that he was himself an Irish landlord, and to approach it in a larger and more liberal spirit. He could, however, assure the hon. member for Kilkenny (Mr. J. O'Connell), that if he arrived at the result were paid into Conciliation Hall, he would not have to find fault with him for many years to come. Looking at all the circumstances of the case, so far, indeed, from being surprised at the present state of Ireland, he was surprised that the country was not in a still worse condition. He hoped the Government would be found equal to the occasion, and that they would bring forward measures, and a thinking, bold and active character, by means of which society in Ireland might be constructed de novo. The previous legislation of this country rendered this an act of only strict justice to that country. The Government have would follow the path which they might think the currency and free imports—that England which not long since—in 1845—had touched the pinnacle of wealth and prosperity, and was the envy and admiration for her riches of surrounding nations—now presenting the lamentable spectacle of shame, bankruptcy, and disgrace, with the finger of scorn pointed at her in every commercial city from New York to Canton—we see those nations which have acted upon an opposite policy flourishing, opulent, respected, and happy. And yet, when the merchants of England, who are participators in this ruin, but not in this disgrace, came to you, and asked you as a Government to relax your monetary restrictions, to the end that those who had property might have the opportunity of disposing of it without a loss—to the end that those who had cotton, and sugar, and woollen cloths, and iron, might be enabled to sell what it is at present—namely, advance £6,000,000 sterling at the rate of £3 17s. 4d. per cent., though it was said the Government themselves had borrowed it at 4 per cent.; instead of acceding to this request, they acted in a manner totally different, for they actually raised the rate of interest. Sir, I remember well when I proposed in the course of the last year a measure for the relief of Ireland, which involved the advance of a large sum of money, not to the landowners or companies of that kingdom,—I remember I was told upon that occasion that her Majesty's Government could not turn money-lenders. (Hear.) But, Sir, what are they now? What are they but money-lenders, money-changers, and usurers. I believe it was never known that any Government of any country proposed to wring money, and make a heavy profit upon the necessities of that country. (Hear, hear.) We are told in the Sacred Volume that "he that lendeth money to the poor we shall not be usurers. But, Sir, the Government have contravened that command, for they have turned usurers; and the fatal effects of their act are to be found in every part of the country. The money-lender could not be deterred from asking too high a price for his article of trade has been only too ready to follow the example set him by the Government on this occasion, and extort what he could from those who needed his assistance. Where the Government fixed the interest of money at the exorbitant sum of 8 per cent., the moneylender had a high example to keep him in countenance while he obtained all that was possible. The price of money has accordingly risen in the market. The best bonds in Scotland, formerly done at five per cent., are now charged six-and-a-half, while the same relative prosperity of increase has taken place in all parts of the Empire. The whole country has been taxed at a sum equivalent to 4½ per cent. upon its property by the measure of the Government, more, in fact, than if it had to pay an Income Tax of 10 per cent. Assuming the whole land of the country to be mortgaged at one-third of its value -and I believe that to be below the actual amount; the land of Ireland has been valued at £20,000,000, and it is mortgaged to the extent of £6,000,000 a year. Suppose the land of England then to be mortgaged to the extent of one-third of its value, the Property and Income Tax returns will tell you that an increase of 1½ per cent. on that rent is equivalent to a tax of £120,000,000 a year on the property of England and Scotland. But all the trades and occupations of the country are taxed in an equal degree by this act of her Majesty's Government, and, therefore, this increase of 4½ per cent. on the usual and ordinary rate of interest on money cannot be less than £720,000,000 a year levied on the property and the industry of the country. Well then, Sir, the Government being accessories before the fact to this enactment of a higher rate of interest than hitherto prevailed in this country —to an act of usury, in fact, upon the nation are we to be told that it is not for the convenience of the House of Commons that its time should be taken up on the second night of the session in hearing and receiving explanations on the subject from the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the First Lord of the Treasury? The noble Lord and the right hon. gentleman seem to have taken all the Skipdicks and the Gobs Overseas, in the City into their confidence, in connection with this question of the rate of interest; for they only seek to exact the largest sum they possibly can obtain from the necessities of the country. They would appear to have adopted the ideas as well as the language of Sir Otho Cresswich, especially when he says—"all men must be made sellers, and I shall be the only purchaser." One would imagine, Sir, that the original authors of the Bank Charter Act and the vested interests of the City had collaborated together and determined to have the whole of the trade, commerce, and landed property of the country transferred to their hands. Lord Bacon says that "usury will soon bring all the pasture of a country into few hands; inasmuch as the usurer being at certainties, and the borrower at uncertainties, the end must soon be that all the money shall come into the box." This, Sir, is the end of their measures. Their object is to transfer all the property of the country into the hands of those who trade in money to transfer it from one set of individuals to another without a sufficient reason. Are we, then, in the face of this fact, to sit down with folded arms and seek for no explanation of the causes which produced it? I will not to ask her Majesty's Government for the grounds on which they hold to the injurious Bank Charter Act, when the condition of the country is at the worst, and, in relation at the least, only do so for the purpose of exciting the Bank of England to exact such an amount of interest—such usury—as was never known in this country, at least for the last century. (Hear, hear.) Sir, I will not enter now on the affairs of Ireland at this moment, further than to say that her Majesty's Government must take themselves responsible for the preservation of the public peace in that country. I shall postpone any discussion of opinion on their policy with regard to it until I see the measures which they mean to introduce to the House. I trust, however, that they will not present the miserable spectacle to the world of one set of men turning out another set upon a question of opinion, and then, in their capacity as a Ministry, governing by the very principles of those they had expelled. (Hear.) I trust, also, that whatever measure may be introduced, it will not be a Coercion Act, to shut up men in their houses at night, in order to deter them from the commission of mid-day murders. But, Sir, while I am prepared to support all useful measures for Ireland, I shall, at the same time, withhold any expression of opinion upon the policy of the Government until their statement is before the House. Neither shall I trouble the House by reviewing the foreign policy of her Majesty's Government on the present occasion; though I am willing to admit that they maintained a prudent silence in respect to their interference in the affairs of Portugal, as well as in regard to their course in Italy, about which they are similarly reserved. When, however, her Majesty's Speech says that a treaty for the suppression of the Slave Trade has been obtained from the Government of Equador, I cannot help thinking that it would have been far more prudent if they had maintained a profound silence upon that subject. The hon. mover of the Address, in alluding to this treaty, described it as another link knocked off the chain which fettered the limbs of the negro. But, Sir, I should very much like to know how many thousands of links have been added to that galling chain, by the introduction of slave-grown sugar into the markets of this country? (Hear.) I should be glad, Sir, to hear, upon official authority, what is the actual amount of increase in the slave trade, before I assent to that proposition. We do certainly read in a newspaper—which is supposed to have occasional information from head-quarters—that the slave trade has been (but only for the moment, I fear) checked; but we have increased fivefold, and that the escapes have been in the same proportion, fivefold. We likewise know that, since the introduction of free-grown sugar into this country, the price of a slave has risen from 200 dollars in Cuba to from 400 to 600 dollars. I am curious, I confess, to know the actual facts. Then, again, there is the export of rice from the Mauritius. It seemed to be stated that the whole rice export, if undiverted would restore the Mauritius to the condition of another Ireland. There were fears of ninety-three thousand coolies being without employment and wanting bread, for rice was the food on which they lived. Well, this we are told has been remedied by a Government bank, issuing notes, and making advances, as we are told, on 9050 tons of sugar, in order that the coolies and the slaves of the Mauritius may be kept alive. Thus we see the noble Lord, with all the power and influence at home (hear, hear, and laughter), issuing 10s. notes, or assignats in the Mauritius. (Hear, hear.) If we do not have an explanation from her Majesty's Ministers on the course of policy adopted by the Government with regard to the Mauritius and the West Indies, more especially as her Majesty congratulated the country, in the last session, on the advantages of having obtained cheap sugar. Sir, there are few, however obtuse their intellects may be, who cannot understand how the failures of the sugar planters in the West Indies and the East Indies—the bankrupt houses of sugar merchants, with their bills returned to Manchester, must have produced to produce their effect on the commercial interests of the country. Within a very short period the rates of Manchester have been more than doubled. The poor-rate in 1835, during a time of prosperity, was only £175,000. How does the existing distress arise? Why, from the dishonourable trade of the ruined sugar and corn merchants. These bills, given in payment of goods, are worthless, and the result is, there is no money to give to the millowner for the purpose of employing people. And if it be true, that during the last ten or eleven months there has been an increase in the exportation of our manufactures to the United States of 7000 packages, the Canadas, the West Indies, and the East Indies, and a terrible balance in favour of India. (Hear, hear.) You have increased on one side 7000 packages; you have lost 30,000 packages on the other—(hear); and this is the balance of trade, the balance of the great scheme of Free Trade from which so much was expected. And, Sir, when we see that her Majesty's speech goes on to recommend to the Legislature the further consideration of the Navigation Laws—(hear, hear); I think prudence requires that the noble Lord will not have the courage ought to hold his ruthless hand. Let us first see how Free Trade measures work a little. Let us recollect how we were told by the right hon. Baronet (Sir R. Peel) and the member for Stockport in 1845, when the Property and Income Tax was renewed, that such was the elasticity imparted to trade and commerce and the industry of the country by his (Sir R. Peel's) commercial measures, that at the expiry of the next spring, he hoped to dispense with the income and Property Tax. (Hear, hear.) Let us now pause, when we are told in her Majesty's Speech that she regrets the injury which the revenue has received—let us pause, Sir, before we proceed in this losing career. (Loud cheers.) Let us remember, if we believe the evidence laid before the Committee of the Navigation Laws, that this question concerns no less than £38,000,000 invested in ships alone, and £14,000,000 invested in other trades connected with shipping. Let us bear in mind that the freights of shipping alone amount to £26,000,000 yearly, and that the annual expenditure is not less than £36,000,000. When such a mighty interest is concerned, without going into the general question, I cannot consent to allow the Address to her Majesty to pass to the form of Report without entering my protest against proceeding further in this same rapid course. (Hear, hear.) Sir, her Majesty's Speech tells us she has given directions to have the estimates laid before the House framed with a careful regard to economy. Sir, I rejoice at this language. I feared, from the circumstances of the times, that some proposition of this sort would have been made. I hope, however, I may congratulate the country on the pleasant prospect of her Majesty's Government being able to dispense with a fresh imposition. (Laughter.) I would fain hope, as the Property and Income Tax expires in the course of next spring, that her Majesty's Ministers even contemplate the possibility of being enabled to dispense with it. (Laughter.) I confess, however, I do not see daylight at present, unless her Majesty's Ministers are prepared to advance their views. The hon. member for Lancashire, however, only can see one ray of sunshine—one ray of light to illumine the gloom and distress of Manchester. If the honourable mover and the hon. seconder could hold out the greatest hope of better times than they did, then, indeed, there are but small hopes of improvement for the country to entertain (Hear.) How changed are the auspices under which we commence this session, and those under which we terminated the session of 1846. (Hear.) Then her Majesty in person appeared among us—then her Majesty permitted her Royal Consort to honour the Commons by sitting among them, in order to grace the pageant and the triumphant procession by which Free Trade was ushered in. (Hear.) High promises were made, high expectations were raised. One hon. gentleman is not in his place. (Hear.) I am surprised not to see the honourable member for the West Riding, and Stockport here at this moment when the dark picture of our distress is placed before us. Sir, were that hon. member here, I think he would consider it to be his duty to explain to the House how it is that all his promises and hopes have been completely broken. (Hear.) I remember in 1841 the hon. member's celebrated address to the people. It was followed up by 416 tons of tracts circulated in the course of the existence of the Anti-Corn-Law League. That hon. member told us in his address it was only necessary to abolish the unchristian Corn-Laws, and within two months from the passing of the bill, he prophesied that flour would be at six farthings a pound, that there would be increased employment, advanced wages, every mill would be employed, churches and chapels would arise everywhere, and, in short, that there would be no bounds to the prosperity of the manufacturing industry of the country. (Hear, hear.) Then, Sir, the hon. member called on all Christian men to put down what he called that iniquitous monopoly, which took from each working man's shilling that fourpence we which he might have had to purchase tea, coffee, and sugar. The hon. member called on us to abolish that impious and unchristian law, which in 1841 was proposed, as the hon member asserted, for no other purpose than to take one-third of the earnings from the wives and families of the poor men, to increase the overgrown wealth of such men as the Duke of Buckingham and Sir James Graham. (Hear, and laughter.) Sir, I rejoice to see the right hon. baronet sitting there in his place, as large as life. (Laughter.) I rejoice to see him looking all health and content, the effect perhaps of contemplating those untold bags of wealth he possesses, in preference to contemplating the ruinous policy of his Trade, of which he is the fatal author. (Laughter.) I rejoice that the right hon. baronet is not the victim of that imprecation put up to the Almighty when he addressed the electors of Dorchester:—

> "May I be cold before that dreadful day,
> Pressed with a load of monumental clay,
> When thou, Imperial Troy, to fate must bend,
> And see thy warriors fall—thy glories end."

How changed since then! Then all was prosperity. Prosperity, wealth, full employment, all greeted this land in 1845. All were happy, all were increasing in wealth. Now we see nothing but ruined commercial houses, and a starving people—the effects of Free Trade, of which the right hon. baronet is the right hon. Baronet and the hon. member for Stockport. Trade and commerce, which before were prosperous, were blighted by the treacherous breath of Free Trade. (Hear.) How changed are our prospects—how applicable the words of the poet:—

> "How like a younker, or a prodigal,
> The scarfed bark puts from her native bay,
> Hugged and embraced by the strumpet wind!
> How like a prodigal doth she return,
> With over-weather'd ribs and ragged sails,
> Lean, rent, and beggar'd by the strumpet wind." (Cheers.)

Lord J. Russell: Sir, before I allude to the speech of the noble Lord the member for Lynn, I wish to make a few remarks in answer to the observations, couched in a temperate tone, made by the hon. member for Middlesex, who asked for some explanation of what her Majesty's Ministers proposed to do for the government of Ireland. The hon. member inquired about one measure with regard to Ireland which passed last session, and had relation to advancing sums of money for the improvement of the land. The hon. member asked why this measure had not been acted upon. I beg to tell the hon. member that all the official persons are now engaged in carrying that measure into effect; and I am happy to say that £1,500,000 has been applied for under the Act; that half a million has already been sanctioned by the Treasury; and that the Act is in full operation. Of course there are many preliminary inquiries to be made, forms to be entered into, and securities to be examined, before the money can be advanced. This, no doubt, has had the effect of disappointing many who may think that advances ought to have been made earlier; but the Act has sanctioned prescribed forms, and they must be complied with. With respect to the measure itself, I trust it will be the means of working much benefit to the parties who obtain these advances; and at the same time of affording increased employment to the people of Ireland. The hon. gentleman asked a question about the bill in relation to encumbered estates. I stated that the measure was only delayed on account of the advanced period of the session, and the strong opposition it met with. That bill has received the attention of Government, and will soon be introduced either in this or the other House. I attach the greatest importance to a measure of this kind; for I believe one of the greatest evils under which Ireland now labours is the nominal possession of estates, the owners of which have encumbered them to such a degree that they are useless to tenants. I think persons who have large estates in such a situation, by selling them at once, would render them valuable. I assure hon. gentlemen generally, with respect to emigration, that I hold emigration to be a useful subsidiary in some respects; but, at the same time, I do not believe there is that amount of over-population in Ireland which some appear to contemplate. (Hear.) I believe that agriculture—that great branch of industry—if pursued with skill and science, would be the means in Ireland of supporting as great a population as here. There is another measure to be introduced in the course of the Session—the amendment of the Grand Jury law. (Hear.) These are measures which we believe will tend to the improvement of the country. There is also another measure which involves a subject of great importance, which I have not alluded to, and, although we have devoted the greatest attention to it, and have gone into the details with the utmost care, we have been as yet unable to determine on such a measure which shall combine improvement of land in Ireland with the undoubted and undefeasible rights of the landowner. The question of landlord and tenant is a very difficult one. If we look back to what has happened in Ireland, it will be found that, for the last twenty years, or going on towards a century, the relation of landlord and tenant has been the source of bitterness has produced violent outrages, and has been met at different times by the severest penalties of legislation. But still the landlord and tenant have never been placed in such a situation as that they could act with reciprocal kindness and confidence, though such a state of things was especially necessary. The question which creates this difficulty began before the Union Roman Catholic question. It is with apprehension, but, at the same time, with hope, that her Majesty's Ministers approach the consideration of this question. Her Majesty's Government, as I have already stated, have devoted their earnest attention to the subject, and they regret they cannot have the advantage of the advice of the late Lord Rosborough, who had well considered the question, and who only deferred bringing in a bill on the subject until he could take his place in the House of Lords to explain the principle of his measure. The death of this nobleman has prevented her Majesty's Government from knowing his views on this subject, and that is a source of much regret. I hope I have now said enough to show that we are not liable to be charged with that which the hon. gentleman did not formally bring against us, but which he intimated—namely, that we had not sufficient attention to the

The merchant makes his own calculations of probable profit or loss. It is better to leave him to do so at once as a matter of business than to be told by an act of Parliament at what price the commodity shall be sold in money. Now, with regard to the actual state of the country, the noble Lord thinks that the want of protective duties and the laws re-acting to the currency have brought us into a state value. I believe that, from these, and other circumstances, we have a great revulsion in trade, and great distress among the commercial and manufacturing world. (Hear.) I do not find, that, in the last few months of the calamity under which we suffered.—I do not find that, in the nine months ending the 10th of October, the exports had decreased

1846, was £4,030,203; and, for the three quarters ending October 10, 1847, they were £6,291,017 making a difference on the amount of exports to the United States, in the two periods, of £2,260,814. That shows, according to the wholesome process of trade, and of exchange, that the amount of

has been the cause of greater export of manufactures. It is to that export, to the return of gold which we have sent, to the favourable exchanges, and to several other circumstances of a favourable augury, though I do not look to an immediate

Mr. G. R. Robinson said, that after a period of thirty years of uninterrupted peace, the country found itself now in a condition which, without exaggeration, was very deplorable; views, was more discouraging than at any period he ever remembered. Whenever such remarks were made as those addressed to the House by the noble Lord below him (Lord G. Bentinck), as to the depressed mercial men in this country he (Mr. Robinson) was not disposed to take a the commercial world. Nothing but a general searching inquiry will restore that permanent improvement; but that conceded, he should not despair that the prosperity of this country would, at all events to a certain extent, be restored, with sufficient emphasis on the effect which Free Trade measures had produced upon Trade, and industry of the country. Free Trade measures had been brought down; but had not that been attended with the destitution and direction. He (Mr. Robinson) did not object to an inquiry into the operation of those laws, in order to consider what modification could be made in them, consistent with the extensive changes in the times, and the due maintenance of the maritime power of the country. He implored the Government not to consider the present state of things could be lightly passed over, and he trusted the general

Free Trade had produced the events which had recently been seen. Those events had arisen from speculations carried on by a system of credit. It had been seen ago. He concurred with the views expressed by the noble Lord at the head of the Government as to the causes of the calamity. He thought that by a system of artificial credit all, both high and low, in this country had been living beyond their means. The Government had set the example of extravagance in all its proper limit, the people would not change. By the abolition of the sugar duties blockades of the coast of Africa, under pretence of putting a stop to the slave trade, would now that £1,000,000 of the public money might be saved. The system of smuggling of men could only be put down by doing that which was agreed with the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that occasional crises could not be prevented in a commercial country; but it was most important to trace them to their right causes. Though he had supported the Banking Act of 1844 he had never anticipated that it would afford security against immortals. In allusion to the state of Ireland, the hon. member said he sincerely rejoiced in the declaration which had been made by the noble Lord (Russell), in

Mr. O'Brien said, he wished the House had formed the House what foreign countries were those which were anxious to reciprocate with the benefits of Free Trade. He supposed it was not the Republics which, he said, had no port. (Laughter.) The right hon. member for Tamworth had pointed out Naples and Russia as countries likely to act with us on these principles. Nevertheless, it must be confessed, that the preferred arrangements of Free Trade had hitherto been positively falsified. It had been prophesied, that the prices would be diminished, that the speculations in corn would be diminished, that the markets would be opened to our manufactures. Had either of those manufactures. In every respect, the Free Trade predictions had failed. The Bank Charter Act was another subject which had equally falsified the predictions pending that Act. It was well to do this; Government had much to answer for in not having done it sooner; they were thereby answerable for the ruin that had previously come on many commercial houses. Having stood out against London, Liverpool, Newcastle and other places they had yielded at last as was stated in the papers—to a representation from parties connected with the northern counties. (Hear.) No one who knew the right hon. Baronet, the Home Secretary, could ever suppose that he had acted on that occasion from any other than the most honourable motives. At any rate, the House was entitled to know—and he remarkable letter. Her Majesty was put forward as having recommended and originated the violation. It would have been more fitly stated that her Majesty's advisers had recommended this to be done. Still he marvelled not with what had made before the close of the session. He considered that Ministers were bound to explain why their interference was made at that particular moment, and to give this explanation in the present debate.

Mr. [illegible] the noble gentleman who had just sat down had recommended the encouragement that had been given during the last few years they had had [illegible] capital to be employed in railroads and other [illegible] and he thought that the noble gentleman would be the last to say that [illegible] was a mistake. Nothing could be more beneficial to the country than the [illegible] railways. (Hear.) He would not anticipate the discussion with reference to the Bank of England, which would more properly come on when his right hon. friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated all the circumstances which had led to the course the Government had adopted, and it would be impossible to answer any specific question on the subject without going into the whole circumstances of the case. He had heard the speech of his right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury [illegible] he [illegible] and [illegible] have been ashamed of the unreasonable attack [illegible] [illegible] [illegible]

MANCHESTER ATHENÆUM—MR. COBDEN.

At the fifth annual soirée of the members of this institution, which was held on Thursday last, Mr. Cobden made his first public re-appearance since his return from his lengthened tour upon the Continent; and, on that occasion, delivered to a crowded and highly intelligent audience, one of those harangues, full of truth and benevolence, which has so often from his lips stirred up, and forced conviction upon, even the most reluctant minds, as well in the Legislature, as in public assemblies. The views, recollections, and hopes of such a man, with reference to a land so interesting as Italy is, must gratify and instruct, even under ordinary circumstances; but, at the present moment, when the hour of her regeneration is at hand, they will be accepted with that addition and strength of faith, which await the words of genius on all critical occasions. We, therefore, give, somewhat fully, some extracts from the gentleman's speech.

After returning to some local topics, he had, he said, on entering the hall, asked a friend what would be the best subject to talk about that evening, and he was advised to dilate, as a general treat, upon his foreign travels. The difficulty was where to begin; for the realms through which he had roamed ranged from Cadiz to Nishni Novgorod. He had been advised to treat something about the European extremes—Spain and Russia. He certainly ought not to speak of his trip to the Continent at all, without taking that, the first public opportunity of expressing his thanks as an Englishman for the cordial welcome he had received in every country it had been his fortune to visit. He said "as an Englishman," because it was something rare in the annals of the world, that a foreigner should travel into almost every country of the Continent, as he should in each find men prepared publicly to sympathise with principles with which he happened to be identified in his own country—these principles being amicable, as they at home had thought, only to the domestic concerns of their own State. (Cheers.) Without entering on a question which even there might be considered to embrace controverted points, he merely submitted the fact of an Englishman being so received abroad, as a proof, at all events, that they were enlarging the circle of their sympathies; that the sphere in which political action was working was widening in their day; that peoples were making common cause with each other with that narrow, jealous spirit, which once was mistaken for the particular patriotism, they were becoming willing to enter into more generous calculations of their own and their neighbours' interests; and the whole world was approaching the time when it would, as he hoped and believed, be discovered that the interests of all were identical. (Loud cheers.) Well, he had observed at the two extremes of his peregrination a curious feature; at one and at the other extreme of Europe. he had found the Oriental type predominant. In Andalusia he had perceived the remains of the Moors, as evidenced in the dress and habits of the inhabitants, and their architecture: and at Moscow, the old capital of the Czars, he encountered the remains of the Tartars, the former predominance of the race being testified by the same signs, in the dress, the buildings, and the customs of the People. At these two limits, and, indeed, without so distant a limitation, there are such opposite points, the reflection had perpetually been forced upon him, "We are so unlike, there is so little real difference between us, in our moral attributes at all events so directly the same, alike in our sympathies and antipathies, and having the so palpable a cause for union, what was it, he had wondered, that had made us one family of man so long enemies?" (Cheers.) There was a little comedy with a deep moral which had lately been performed with great success at Paris, entitled "Faute de s' Entendre." The plot rested upon a series of mistakes; the parties in the scene, because they were ignorant of the original intentions of each other, consummated a variety of blunders, and were subjected to innumerable hardships; and at the conclusion it was discovered that each might have been very happy if one had only known what the other had been about. (Laughter.) Through all Europe he had found the same thing had been played by successive Governments, a misunderstanding being the best defence for all the mischief they had occasioned. (Hear, hear.) At times the comedy had become a tragedy, and human happiness and human life had then been sacrificed, simply because general ignorance prevailed of the one common good. (Cheers.) And, therefore, if they could only find out the means—and sometimes in Manchester they had been enough to suppose they had discovered the key of the secret—to demonstrate to the different nations of Europe that their interests were identical and universal, they would confer the greatest blessing on humanity ever devised since the creation of the world. (Cheers.) In that most interesting country, interesting to them all, and with which so many of their associations of interest were connected, he found the people now on a new life springing up; and when he inquired how it was that Italy now began to make itself heard and felt through the rest of Europe, he had come to the conclusion, from all he had witnessed, that the regeneration arose from the quiet progress of thought and intelligence dependent upon the bettered education of the people. He had found that in that country great efforts had been recently made for the education of the people; to his astonishment he had discovered that in almost every town of 15,000 or 20,000 inhabitants, there were established several infant schools, supported by voluntary contributions, and superintended by Italian nobles. He had even at Turin fallen in with a school where a Marquis attended daily as director, joining the children in their play, and riding with them on a rocking-horse. (Laughter.) There were now in Italy, as there had always been, leading minds, and striking inhabitants, in all directions of society, who had been engaged in discussing every question of social importance: in every town of Italy men were to be met with who took a deep interest, not only in schools, but in prison discipline, and all other questions affecting the moral condition of the people. He had been especially amazed at the number of practical people who sympathised with their efforts and controversies in England on the subject of political economy. Every lawyer, every counsellor in Italy, now studied that science as a part of his professional education, and hence arose the deep interest there taken on that subject in which they had so long and so arduously engaged in England. To this quiet, slow, and gradual influence of the few on the many, and not to popular commotions and angry outbreaks, was the existing hopeful condition of Italy attributable. Violence and revolution retarded progress; and he traced to institutions, which had been everywhere founded in that country, kindred in their characteristics to the Athenæum, though not exactly the same, all the improvements which had lately arisen there. (Hear, hear.) He joined with the worthy Chairman in saying that it was by the progress of the human mind alone that Governments could progress, or that good Governments could be maintained at all. He agreed further with the Chairman in saying that, in these times, public opinion controlled Governments: and he would say still more emphatically, speaking from experience, that there was no such thing as despotism now, in the old sense of the word—that public opinion ruled more or less everywhere—ruled better in proportion as the people were wise; and gave him the compound ratio of intelligence among the people, and he would describe to them the character of the Government, no matter what might be its form or structure. (Cheers.) If they inquired from him, after his long tour, what now recurred to his memory, with the sincerest pleasure he was bound to say it was Italy and the Italians; not on account of those monumental remains which demonstrated the boast of the Italians that they had given great civilisation to the world, but because of the enjoyment he had derived from intercourse there with the most enlightened men of the day. (Hear, hear.) He liked intercourse best with existing intellect; he passed by the aqueducts, the tombs, the columns, and the ruins; and among the Italians were at this moment to be found no less men among the mass of the people, but in the middle and upper classes, some of the most amiable and accomplished and interesting men now living. (Hear, hear.) He argued that in the present effort that was being made in Italy, they would see progress just in proportion as the people became more and more enlightened. They had in Italy now, as always, a first-rate natural quality in the race; and if the people were but left to themselves—if they but obtained that privilege which we claimed invariably for ourselves—if the Italians were only permitted unmolested, to work out their own regeneration, he doubted not that that same race from which civilisation had twice before proceeded to the rest of Europe, would again effect their redemption. (Loud cheers.) He earnestly accorded the advice of the Chairman to all young men, with respect to the study of the modern languages, and he (Mr. Cobden) could speak feelingly on that topic. Oh, if he had his time over again, and were in the beginning placed in the situation of many young men in that hall, he would not endure any more of twenty-five without obtaining the perfect mastery of French, German, and Italian. Perhaps a hundred years hence English would be spoken by a greater number of human beings than had ever yet existed; but at this moment French was the language of intercourse for the travelling Englishman in every corner of the Continent; and he recommended the study in Manchester because he hoped, ere long, to see the time when operatives from all parts of the world should meet in cheap trains in Paris. (Loud cheers.) He wished to see the different people of the world married, instead of those matches between Princes from which spring so much turmoil and confusion. (Cheers.) He would not deduce any more morals from his voyaging. He had returned home, as he had set out, satisfied that it was in institutions like this Athenæum they could find, not only the great distinctive character of the English people from the whole of Europe, but that there also they must seek, in the improvement of mind among young men and adults, that superiority which in some respects we did possess over the continental nations. (Cheers.) With those institutions we got the credit of having within ourselves the character and spirit of associations; how could that spirit be better directed than to the maintenance of such institutions as this? They might take for granted that, if they could not co-operate successfully for such an object, they would fail in any other movement they might undertake. (Cheers.)

After some further remarks in conclusion, the hon. gentleman resumed his seat, amidst the most enthusiastic applause.

LITERATURE.

Hints to the Sick, the Lame, and the Lazy; or, Passages in the Life of a Hydropathist. By a Veteran. Olivier.

The head and front of this book remind one of the Old Man's "Bubbles," which, some years since, sent thousands of invalids to the Brunnens of Nassau, and thus soon converted a cheap and quiet retreat into a focus of extravagance and fashion. The resemblance of "Hints" to the Old Man's volumes, however, soon disappears: we look in vain for his quiet humour, his felicitious illustration of every-day matters, and his abundant common sense, which is brought to bear upon every point of consequence to the reader. In short, never was more delightful Guide-book written than the said "Bubbles." In the "Hints," the Veteran is ever aiming to be smart, and, accordingly, his failures are frequent: however, some of these are droll enough, just as certain small wit of the day is estimated by the inverse ratio of its goodness.

The Veteran opens with a strong fire upon the Britisher's fondness for physicking—the Drugophobia—in lieu of which the author recommends the Water cure. At starting, he, however, allows that—

"Hydropathy has much to contend with. One difficulty is, that of procuring proper baths and attendants. This is, indeed, yet at rest by entering a Water-cure establishment. Another difficulty occurs in the case of the patient's purse, who, having been emaciated by an irregular or luxurious life, would, in the majority of cases, reap great advantage from the course; but then, he is unwilling to enter upon a new mode of life, and to submit to the restrictions which are indispensable to a cure. Such a man is likely to remain in the trammels of the old system, and he may be patched up without making any great deviation from his habitual mode of life. If he swallow a commensurate amount of physic, he need not be urged to take very violent exercise, and may continue to indulge in his snug little dinner, and pint of wine to match. The time demanded for the cure of chronic complaints, by hydropathic treatment, forms still more formidable objection, one which, to the man of business is almost insurmountable, is, that it claims from all a degree of faith which is not readily accorded: especially when it implies the abandonment of comforts to which the patient has long accustomed. The patient would, indeed, find that the system recommended is full of enjoyment, and that the simple diet of the water-cure patient is relished with a gusto unknown to the pampered slave of caliquah and callipee—to those comfortable gourmets, who begin dinner with soup, fish, and entrée, washed down with two or three glasses of sherry, whilst he would acknowledge that his postprandiary lightness of spirits far more than compensated for any degree of abstinence, and his unbroken slumber sends him forth in his day's work like a giant refreshed. These difficulties of faith which I not readily accorded especially when it implies the abandonment of comforts to which the patient has long accustomed. The patient would, indeed, find that the system recommended is full of enjoyment, and that the simple diet of the water-cure patient is relished with a gusto unknown to the pampered slave of caliquah and callipee—to those comfortable gourmets, who begin dinner with soup, fish, and entrée, washed down with two or three glasses of sherry, whilst he would acknowledge that his postprandiary lightness of spirits far more than compensated for any degree of abstinence, and his unbroken slumber sends him forth in his day's work like a giant refreshed. These difficulties of faith which I not readily accorded, I am not aware that I have ever been able to induce any one to change his opinion on any subject, much less to adopt a new system. I can scarcely expect that I am now to commence a successful career in persuasion; but I do hope that I may succeed in inducing some few to turn their attention to the subject, and to consult the works of those authors who have written scientifically upon it."

There is much shrewdness in these preliminaries to the statement of how the Veteran was led into watery ways—how he got the gout by eating and drinking 365 good dinners and 365 pints of wine annually—how he placed himself under homœopathic treatment, and soon grew well enough to journey to Switzerland—how the gout re-appeared in the Alps, and he rejected Cullenism, at length journeyed to Boppart, where there are two water-cure establishments; and in one of them, the Anstalt, superintended by Dr. Halmann, the Veteran becomes located. We quote a portion from the next chapter, on Treatment:—

"On the following morning (after my arrival) I was awakened by Jacob at half-past four, who requested me to jump out of bed, which cooling prescription having been followed, he laid on the bed a double-milled blanket (it is always a part of my baggage now), over which he spread a damp sheet, and arranged the propriety of my lying down on the same, which I did, and he tucked me up in it, leaving out the feet, and then he packed the thick blanket over feet and all, tucking it in as if he would throttle me. Then came the cold-shower-down-come-pud, tied on my chest, and two more blankets, and over all my blue cloak. At first, my sensations were those of a man who lies down on a wet sheet; but, after four or five minutes, every disagreeable feeling vanished—and within half an hour I was fast asleep. By half-past six or seven I was in a perspiration, when I was put on an empty pan, and, a sheet being thrown over me, sundry buckets of water were poured upon my head, even while the sweat damp sheet, and my attendants rubbed me dry with a clean sheet, and so ended the introductory scene. I was dashed to drink three or four glasses of water, and to take a brisk walk (Hochgie Saziergang), after which I returned at eleven o'clock to find the brausebad or shower-bed, which finished my water performances for the day. On finding the latter operations are recalled, that the attendants may have at least half a day of rest. I have only to add, that the day's operations in a very cursory manner; it was but a prelude to the grand system of attack, by which Herr Gunz means to be indulged. I was not pleased with what I had already done. It appeared to me that I should soon be sick of the treatment, and I began to speculate upon making some excuses to cut and run. This feeling gradually wore away, and, having thus begun on Sunday, by Thursday I was not only reconciled to, but enamoured of, the cure. During my wake and constitutional, I never missed one bath, nor once neglected to drink my prescribed glasses of water, after each bath. I may mention, that the British are accounted the most regular of all the visitors to the establishment, to its credit. On Monday began my grand course. At half-past four I was sleepwatch'd, put out the application of the damp sheet, three blankets, a feather-bed, and my military cloak, formin

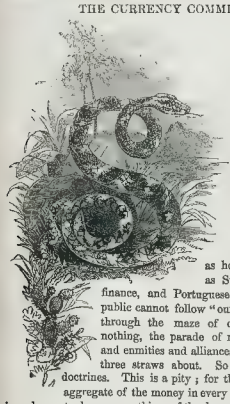
THE CURRENCY COMMITTEE.



SNAKE-LIKE as the involutions and intricacies of the Currency question are, its greatest difficulty is not its abstruseness; it is less understood than it ought to be, simply because people will not attempt to understand it. It ranks with those subjects that fill the columns of the papers, and nobody attends to, which are given up as hopeless enigmas, such as Swiss politics, Spanish finance, and Portuguese warfare. The busy public cannot follow "our own correspondent," through the maze of changes that lead to nothing, the parade of names never heard of, and enmities and alliances it is difficult to care three straws about. So it is with Currency doctrines. This is a pity; for the Currency is but the aggregate of the money in every man's pocket; and it is no harm to know something of the laws that govern the mass, just as it may be the better for our lungs if we knew a little of the composition of the atmosphere. The much dreaded "difficulty," in the way of popular comprehension, we imagine to be this—that of the bulk of society each individual has to deal throughout his life with such small sums, gained and spent in such petty amounts, that the general laws which operate on large masses, cease, practically, to exist as far as his share of the "wealth of nations" is concerned. It is certain that if peculiar circumstances oblige a man to study the theory of the tides by observation of nothing more extensive than a pint of sea water, he will have considerable "difficulty" in accounting for all the phenomena of the ebb and flow. By common consent the question is given up to bankers, discounters who transact business to the amount of a million a week, financiers, Prime Ministers, Chairmen of Railways, and editors of newspapers; to all these some acquaintance with that which everybody else gives up as hopeless, is a matter of necessity.

As the Parliament has been summoned principally to consider the subject, and "inquire" how it is that all who wanted money in these latter months have been unable to get it, except by desperate efforts, similar to those we read of as having been made in besieged cities, where bread was as scarce as gold has been in Lombard-street, a few explanations of some of the leading points of the subject may not be useless, as helps towards the understanding of the week's debate, and the object of the Committee to be appointed, we presume, at the close of it.

We do not pretend to pluck out the heart of the mystery, for, in truth, we begin to doubt whether there is much mystery in the matter. The acquirement of wealth by a nation is as easy to explain as the same process in the individual. Peculiar qualities, and the energy that makes the most of them, is the whole secret. England is the richest nation of the world, simply because she is favourably placed in it geographically, has iron and coal, a climate that makes toil rather a necessity than an evil, and a people with whom work, business, occupation, have become almost a second religion. We are all borne along together in one circle of incessant toil, unknown in any other part of the world; whether we are the happier for that is quite another question; certain it is we are richer, and, at present, we treat only of wealth. Leaving the accumulation of riches thus accounted for, we come to the first complication of the subject—the Exchanges. Here, again, the explanation is simple to a degree; generally we sell to other nations more than they sell to us, and they owe us a balance, on which we can draw if we want it; the "exchange" is then in our favour, and gold "comes into the country;" not by any mysterious law, not that the precious metal migrates from land to land at uncertain intervals capriciously, but because we have earned it; not a coin comes to us for which we have not given value in some shape or other. The converse is equally clear; by a failure in what we cannot make at will, the supply of food, we buy the surplus of other nations, and buying of them more than they buy of us, we owe them a balance; it is drawn on, the Exchange turns against us, and "gold leaves the country." There is nothing alarming in it; it is as natural as the ebb of water from the river channel; the return of things to their former course is just as certain; and the enabling nations thus to assist each other, is one of the most beautiful and beneficial uses of a metal that locked up in heaps is as valueless as paving stones.

Circulation and currency are terms applied to the money we pass from one to another in our daily business. It is with respect to this part of our national wealth, that the most conflicting theories are broached. The difficulty is not so much the medium that is to circulate, but the quantity of it in proportion to the whole wealth of the kingdom. Land, cattle, houses, furniture, are all property; and some theorists contend they might be represented by notes to pass as money, as legitimately as the ingots of gold, and coined sovereigns in the cellars of the Bank. At this point we land on the principle of "convertibility," and its opposite Convertibility is the term applied to all paper that may be changed into gold on demand, to the full amount inscribed on that paper. It is this power which converts it into cash; if any other process has to be gone through, that paper is not money, it only represents credit. An acceptance—as too many know to their sorrow—has to be discounted; an Exchequer Bill must be sold, before its sum can be realised; a bill of exchange is liable to doubt: the party on whom it is drawn may not be solvent. All these are wealth, but not money; they are part of the capital of the country; they may be reckoned as part of its circulation, but they are not currency.

The answer to the "expansives"—the advocates of a paper circulation based on property—is so plain and simple, that it is difficult to conceive how there can be two opinions on the point. Houses and land are property; but they are not available property; their value may be represented by notes, but it could not be obtained except after the long process necessary to convert them into money: in the meantime, the notes based on them suffer a decrease in their value, and can only be paid away at a discount. This is what is called "depreciation." Its effects are so ruinous when it occurs on a large scale, that, of all calamities that could happen to us, the most fatal would be an inconvertible paper currency.

While admitting this, we still think the money in circulation might be increased, and the principle of convertibility be strictly preserved. A note that represents any portion of the precious metals of the universal currency of the world, cannot be depreciated; but whether that portion shall be small or great, one sovereign or five, is immaterial. Rigidly enforcing payment in coin "on demand," a note for five shillings is as safe as one for five pounds. The Prussian thaler notes represent 3s. each; the Russian paper ruble is as good as its amount in silver, 3s. 3d. Nor can we see why notes should not be issued on the security of silver as well as gold. Half the difficulties of the Currency Question are, in truth, only the difficulties of understanding the proceedings of the Bank of England. Its constitution is an anomaly, being divided in its duties to the Government and its proprietors. Its course has not been prudent or far seeing; and public opinion points to a change. When we have a National Bank of Deposit and Issue, the managers of which are not traders on their own account, we will answer for it, the "Currency Question" will be amazingly simplified.

FOREIGN AND COLONIAL NEWS.

FRANCE.

The defeat of General Dumas, aide-de-camp of the King, who was candidate for the representation of Rochefort in the Chamber of Deputies, but who lost his election by an adverse majority of 11 votes, has produced a profound sensation in Paris, and, coupled with the increase of Radicalism demonstrated at the Reform dinners which occur daily in the departments, caused much apprehension among the friends of Ministers. At the Reform banquets noticed in the journals of Tuesday, the health of the King was uniformly omitted. We observe also that a man was convicted before the Cour d'Assises of Paris, on Monday, of distributing seditious placards and pamphlets in the villages round Paris.

The Gazette des Tribunaux states that Miss Birch, was condemned by default, on Friday, by the Tribunal de Commerce of Paris to pay 30,000f. (£1200) to MM. Dupouchel and Nestor Roqueplan, directors of the Paris Opera, for having quitted Paris and violated her drama[illegible].

The influenza is very prevalent at Marseilles. Of a population numbering 150 000 souls, the half at least was confined to bed within the last week. Persons of an apprehensive nature, remembering that the influenza preceded the cholera morbus, and reading in the journals the new itinerary of the plague scourge, feel their terrors increase, though the present epidemic is as inoffensive as the former one.

The Sanatory Board, in its sitting of the 25th, ordered a rigorous quarantine of twelve days for the Mentor, and decided that in future all steamers, without distinction, coming from places where the cholera exists, although they may have had no case on board, shall undergo a quarantine of five days, to be increased if any case of death or sickness has taken place during the voyage.

A Council of Ministers was held on Sunday, to arrange amicably the dispute between M. Guizot and Dumon, respecting the offensive reference to the nomination of M. Napoleon Duchatel to the embassy at Turin, imputed to the former, and which provoked the resignation of that appointment by M. N. Duchatel. The Minister of the Interior did not attend the Council. The matter rests, therefore, unsettled Sudden deaths appear to multiply in Paris. M. Tschann, the Swiss Chargé d'Affaires, died suddenly this morning. These occurrences, and the prevalence of the grippe (influenza), which rages at present in the French capital, recall the recollection of similar events before the arrival of the cholera, in 1832. Sir Stratford Canning arrived in Paris on Monday, as Ambassador for Turkey, but special y charged with the representation of Great Britain in the conference on Swiss affairs whenever and wherever it shall occur. He had an interview with M. Guizot on Monday, and had since visited the Austrian, Russian, and Prussian Ambassadors or Ministers. He was to leave yesterday for Neufchatel, the point of réunion for the Representatives of the five Powers.

The Polish refugees celebrated at Paris, on the 29th ult., the 17th anniversary of their revolution. The members of the Literary Society assembled in the morning under the Presidency of Prince Czartoryski, and those of the Democratic Society separate y met at the Athenæum. In the evening the general reunion at all the Polish residents in Paris took place in the Concert-hall of Valentino, the chair being occupied by M. Vavin, the Deputy of the fifteenth Municipal District of Paris

Accounts from Madrid to the 24th ult., furnish us with the first discussion [illegible]. It is principally remarkable as showing a serious schism in the [illegible]. It is difficult at present to foresee the result, but it is thought probable that Narvaez will be driven out of power by the very parties who have brought him in.

The murder of a servant maid in the Palace of Queen Christina has created a great sensation. Her Majesty's chaplain, in whose service the unhappy woman had been, was arrested, but there were no probable grounds of suspicion existing to criminate him.

ITALY.

In consequence of the existence of cholera in the harbours of the Black Sea [illegible] importation of the fruit of Italy, it has been decided that all [illegible] having left, or carrying, France and Malta, for the kingdom of the Two [illegible] after 1 st of November, must be furnished with a certificate of the Board of Health of a Majesty's mail steamer, or other equivalent, in the port of departure, but that no vessel has entered it with cases of cholera on board; and, in the event of such cases having occurred, the certificate must indicate what measures have been adopted; and if the vessels in question bring a certificate with such an affirmative declaration, or if they be not furnished with that certificate, free pratique shall be suspended until further orders. This measure is also to be applied to vessels arriving from Greece and the Ionian [illegible].

It is Italian journals afford grounds for the hope that the King of Naples may be led into a course of less benighted policy. The Piedmontese Gazette contains an official [illegible] of the Sardinian Government, affirms that the institution of the customs league between Rome, Tuscany, and Piedmont, the reforms in these states, and most especially in the latter, and the resignation of M. Pietro Catella, which, as we have already announced, was accompanied by a solemn declaration of his opinion that nothing but a system of reform can save the country, have conspired to work a change in the mind of King Ferdinand, who has commissioned M. Pietro Catella to form a plan of general reform. That Minister has [illegible] held conferences with the Envoys of the three Italian states and the British Minister at Turin. The last appointment is to be Viceroy of Sicily and to trade at Palermo. The adhesion of Naples to the customs league is positively affirmed.

Several Ministerial changes have been announced, all of which are of good augury to an improved state of things. The Minister of the Interior, M. Santangelo, has been compelled to retire, receiving the title of Marquis, and the [illegible] of Honorary Counsellor of State. This Ministry is resolved into three [illegible] of Public Works; 2, that of Commerce and Agriculture [illegible] the Interior. IMPERIAL PARLIAMENT.

HOUSE OF LORDS.—MONDAY.

The EARL of ELLESMOROUGH gave notice that he would, on an early day, move for returns of advances made on the hypothecation of goods in India; and also for a return of advances made for purposes of railways in India.

The House then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS. MONDAY.

The Speaker took the chair at the usual hour.

RAILWAYS BILL.—Mr. JACKSON said he was afraid the House had not been in possession of the Railways Bill a sufficient length of time to enable hon. members to consider its provisions; and he, therefore, had to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to postpone the second reading.—The CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER thought it was quite right that time should be given for the consideration of the bill; but it was important that the measure should be pushed forward as soon as possible, and he trusted the House would take the second reading as a matter of course, on his promising that time should be allowed for its consideration before it went into Committee. On the motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, the bill was subsequently read a second time, and ordered to be committed on Friday.

COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.—On the motion of Lord J. RUSSELL, the House went into Committee of Supply. Mr. HUTTON in the chair.—That portion of the Speech from the Throne relating to the Public Estimates having been read, and the question put by the Chairman, "that a Supply be granted to her Majesty," Mr. HUME inquired whether it was the intention of Government to propose the appointment of a Committee to consider the subject of the general taxation of the country, with a view of ascertaining what else could not be done in a manner that should be less troublesome and expensive to the country than under the present system?—Lord J. RUSSELL replied that it was not their intention to propose any measure, either on the question of the general taxation of the country, or in relation to the whole expenditure of the country. Mr. HUME would take that opportunity of giving notice that, on a future day, he should submit to the House the propriety of appointing such a Committee. The motion, "That a Supply be granted to her Majesty," having been agreed to, the House resumed.

CRIME IN IRELAND.

Sir G. GREY then proceeded at some length to address the House in support of the bill which he was about to introduce for the prevention of crime and outrage in certain parts of Ireland, observing that he did so with feelings of deep regret, but in the discharge of what he conceived to be an imperative duty. The right hon. gentleman commenced by observing, that, in consequence of the unfortunate calamity of a want of provisions with which Ireland had been visited in the year 1845 and the present year, the Government had felt it to be its duty to propose to Parliament measures calculated to mitigate the distress and arrest the progress of the famine and disease that were rapidly spreading throughout the country. Parliament cheerfully responded to the appeal, and various acts were passed calculated to effect these objects, by relieving the immediate and pressing necessities of the people, and enabling the landowners to improve their lands and employ the people. Acts were also passed for the permanent relief of the destitute poor in Ireland; and, if they could only secure the co-operation of all classes of society in carrying out the objects of the Legislature, he was not prepared to abandon the hope that the beneficial results anticipated from those measures might yet be realised. He would promise that the cases to which he was about to refer applied to only a small portion of Ireland, and he rejoiced to say that in the greater portion of that country life and property were just as safe as in any other part of the empire. He was happy, also, to add, that the general result of the criminal statistics furnished by the constabulary showed a great diminution as compared with former periods, and taking the month of October last as compared with October, 1846, there had been a diminution of the ordinary class of offences of one third. The bill he was about to propose would apply only to those districts in which crime of a peculiar character against the rights of property, and which every man should defend who dared to exercise these rights. The crime to which he adverted had not developed itself in those districts of Ireland in which distress was the greatest; on the contrary, there was quite the reverse. He did not allude to the fearful crimes, or any ground for the supposition the people might be driven to their perpetration by starvation and distress. As regarded the measure he was about to propose, he had a right to say that it would cure the many evils that afflicted Ireland —it would be very short-sighted policy of any Government to suppose that the prevention of crime by police regulations would be sufficient. A wise Government would look to causes rather than to symptoms; and he looked upon the visit he had paid to districts in which crime prevailed to an alarming extent that the provisions of his bill were meant to apply; and he should now detail to the House some proof of the cases that had lately taken place in Ireland—cases that, although of the most daring and atrocious character, and which were in almost every instance followed by the perfect impunity of the assassins. After going through a length ened catalogue of the murders and outrages which had occurred within the last two months, the right hon. gentleman pointed out the powers which the Lord-Lieutenant at present possessed for the repression of outrage and crime, observing that he believed at present that Lord Clarendon had not discharged his important and responsible duties with vigour and efficiency. It was not his intention at present to ask for any general bill for the whole of Ireland; he merely asked that it should be left to the discretion of the Lord-Lieutenant, to such districts as were characterised by an extraordinary amount of crime. The first clause would empower the Lord-Lieutenant, with the advice of his Privy Council, wherever he might consider it might appear necessary for the prevention of crime and outrage, to issue a proclamation that the provisions of the present act should, from and after a certain day, apply to the district. The definition of the district would be in the discretion of the Lord-Lieutenant. The second clause provided for the posting up copies of the proclamation, and an abstract of the provisions of the act, throughout the proclaimed district. The third clause gave the Lord-Lieutenant power to send additional police or additional number of constabulary he might deem necessary into the disturbed district. He proposed to increase the reserved constabulary force at the disposal of the Lord-Lieutenant from 400 to 600; and that, wherever an increased number of police were required for the suppression of crime and the protection of the public, the whole expenses of that additional number should be borne by the district. The payment was not to be postponed to a remote period, as in ordinary cases, but a estimate of the charge for three months should be made out and levied upon the district. At the expiration of that period, if the services of the police were still required, a further levy to the same amount should be made. With regard to the repression of the use and purchase of fire-arms, he proposed that there should be a general prohibition within the proclaimed district, irrespective of rank or amount of rating, with the exceptions enumerated in the bill. He proposed a general prohibition to carry or have fire-arms within the district elsewhere than in a dwelling-house, under a penalty of imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. The exceptions he proposed were Justices of the Peace, persons in her Majesty's naval and military service, in the Coast Guard, or Revenue service, in the police or constabulary, special constables, or persons duly licensed to kill game. There were also persons who were compelled to be armed in the discharge of their duties, such as poor-rate collectors, and these men would necessarily require to be armed for their protection. A person to be licensed by the Lord-Lieutenant, and unconnected with the local magistracy, would be empowered to grant licenses in these exceptional cases. The police would also be empowered to apprehend and search all suspicious persons. He was of opinion that the same absolute prohibition should be carried out with regard to persons having arms in their houses, as many of the small farmers had procured arms for the purposes of defending themselves and their property. The Lord Lieutenant would have the power to issue a notice which would be applicable to the whole or part of a district, calling upon all persons not included in these exceptions to deliver up their arms at the nearest police-station, and all persons detaining them after such notice should be deemed guilty of a misdemeanour power would also be given to search the houses of persons suspected of concealing fire-arms; such search only to take place during the day time. Power was also given to call upon all persons between the ages of sixteen and sixty to assist in the prevention of crime and the arrest of offenders; and any neglect or refusal would subject the party to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years. After enumerating some smaller matters of detail, the right hon. gentleman called upon the House to give him its support in carrying through a measure which, in the present circumstances of Ireland, was absolutely required, and concluded by moving for leave to bring in his bill.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL confessed he had been agreeably disappointed, as he had anticipated a much more stringent measure. He, for one, should not violate the usual courtesy of the House in refusing his assent to its introduction; but he hoped sufficient time would be given to have the opinion of the people of Ireland before it was brought forward for a second reading.

Mr. F. O'CONNOR entered his protest against the bill, and against every species of coercion, believing that the proper and efficient administration of the existing law would be sufficient to put down crime and outrage in Ireland. Sir George Grey had himself borne testimony to the efficiency of its administration, and he regretted that the hon. member for Kilkenny should have offered his adulation to the Ministry for a measure of coercion, which he, for one, would never submit to.

Mr. HORSMAN strongly censured the conduct of the Roman Catholic priests who denounced men from the altar, who were, as a matter of course, assassinated. The murderer, if apprehended, was hanged, but the law did not touch the man who denounced the victim. He equally condemned the wholesale system of ejectment, which left hundreds, naked and starving, to pine upon the roadside The wretched outcasts who felt that the law gave them no protection, took the law into their own hands, and were punished, but the law did not reach him who thus jeopardised the lives of hundreds. He called upon the Government to let remedial measures go hand in hand with measures of coercion.

Mr. W. FAGAN expressed his determination to support Mr. O'Connor in his opposition to the bill.

Lord JOCELYN feared that the present measure would be found wholly inefficient for the repression of crime. He trusted the Government would see the necessity of taking some steps which would have the effect of giving confidence to life and property, and drew an appalling picture of the condition to which the Irish landlords were reduced, although it was to them the Government must ultimately look for support and co-operation in restoring tranquility.

Lord BERNARD also advocated a more stringent measure. He thought it would have been better even to enrage the law to some extent, than to permit Ireland to remain any longer in the deplorable position in which she was placed

Mr. P. SCROPE feared that the measure, like many others that preceded it, would be wholly inoperative for the purpose they had in view. He strongly urged upon the Government the propriety of adopting remedial measures of legislation, but would at once give the bill before the House his best support. The right hon. gentleman briefly glanced at the various suggestions that had been made to remedy the evils under which Ireland laboured. Emigration had been strongly urged and warmly advocated, but when they came to consider the question closely, they found many and serious difficulties connected with the transfer of any large body of persons to the Colonies. With regard to the tenant-right, it had been urged that it was owing to it that the north of Ireland was comparatively free from crime, but he believed there were other causes in operation to account for the exemption. Turning to the bill before the House, he took exception to some of its details, more especially that of disarming all the people among the proclaimed districts. In the exemption clause, as it would leave many honest persons in a great measure defenceless. Under all the circumstances, he strongly urged the immediate enactment of a law against murder, and hoped all parties would concur in supporting it.

Mr. M. O'CONNELL, although objecting to some of the details, would offer no active opposition to the bill.

Mr. DUNCALLY vindicated the course adopted by himself and his friends in opposing the Irish Arms Bill of the late Government. He greatly doubted the efficacy of the proposed measure, and he very much questioned whether an addition of 200 constables would restore tranquility to Ireland.

Mr. WAKLEY understood Mr. O'Connor to say that he would divide the House against the introduction of the bill—a step which would place many hon. members in a very invidious position. It was his intention, however, to propose an amendment to the effect, "That it was not just 'to the people of Ireland to enact any bill of a coercive character, without, at the same time, enacting measures with a view to their permanent relief."

After a few words from Mr. BROTHERTON in support of the bill,

Mr. REYNOLDS moved the adjournment of the debate.

Lord J. RUSSELL, seeing that the Irish Members who had come down to the House to oppose the bill had expressed their intention to permit its introduction, thought it would be extremely inconvenient to postpone the discussion on the first reading for another night.

Mr. REYNOLDS withdrew his motion, and the House then divided on Mr. Wakley's amendment, which was negatived by a majority of 238 to 20; and a second division then took place on the original motion, which was carried by a majority of 224 to 18.

The bill was then read a first time, and the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF LORDS. TUESDAY

Lord ELLENBOROUGH moved for, and obtained, certain returns relative to the hypothecation of goods in India. Adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

In answer to a question from Mr. O'CONNELL, Sir G. GREY said the Government did not intend to ask Parliament for any further advances of money from Ireland; large stores of food, left from last year, were in the hands of the Executive; nor would any further advances be made to landed proprietors by way of loan.

SWITZERLAND.—To a question put by Mr. URQUHART, Lord PALMERSTON stated that it had been the wish of a Government to have abstained from all interference with the dissensions of Switzerland. But, at the earnest request of the French Government, they were induced to offer, in conjunction with the other five Powers, their mediation. Her Majesty's Government made it a condition that it should be optional to either of the contending parties to refuse the mediation; and should the mediation be, in fact, refused, that that should form no ground of hostile interference on the part of the Six Powers.

THE MONETARY PRESSURE.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the recent commercial distress, and how far it had been aggravated by the law restricting the issue of bank-notes. The right hon. gentleman commenced his speech by observing that, although he was not obliged to ask Parliament for a Bill of Indemnity for an actual violation of the law, he had to ask the judgment of the House as to his conduct in advising the Bank of England, should circumstances have rendered it necessary, to exceed the law. In taking the course which the Government had taken—that is, a middle course —they knew they had themselves open to blame from all parties, and, accordingly, they were told by some that they ought to have gone out at all, and that their interference had done no good, by others they were told that they ought to have interfered sooner; whilst, by many, they were censured because they had not departed altogether from the principles of the Bank Charter Act of 1844, and adopted principles diametrically opposite. Had they done this last, they would have acted against their firm convictions; for, although they did not believe that the Act could be so framed as to render it unnecessary to propose applicable to all periods of commercial prosperity and depression, they did think the Act of 1844 one most salutary in its principles, although one that it was not indispensable to bring into operation during a commercial crisis. The Act had been tried at a time unprecedented for extraordinary enterprise, for unparalleled extension of trade, for general distrust, and for universal alarm and panic; therefore, it could not be fairly condemned as insufficient by the experience of the country. The right hon. gentleman, having replied to the advocates of a depreciated currency, at a time like the present, turned to consider the causes of the panic. The pressure arose in this summer of 1846, in the extraordinary expenditure of capital for corn and railways acting upon a state of unduly developed credit. The right hon. gentleman proceeded to contrast the amount of accommodation given by the Bank and by the amount of circulation in the hands of the public in the year 1839—a year of severe commercial pressure —and the present, and thence argued that it was not to a want of bank-notes, or Bank accommodation, that the recent commercial difficulties were attributable. The abstraction of capital from the usual channels of trade had caused the whole difficulty. In October, a monetary change had taken place in the aspect of commercial affairs. The Bank had, in September, made advances of Government balances for limited periods, and, in October, repayment of these advances was required, and that caused the pressure which forced the Government then, very reluctantly to interfere. An adequate amount of circulation was even then in the hands of the public, but it was hoarded up, through fear and alarm; and the Government could not resist the application for relief, but to do something to "restore confidence," for that was all that was asked for. The rate of 8 per cent., as the interest to be taken under the letter to the Bank had been fixed on by the best mercantile advice. It was necessary to raise the rate of interest, in order to limit the increased issue of notes, and 8 per cent. was the maximum that seemed to the Government the best rate. Orders from abroad were coming into the country, activity was springing up in the manufacturing districts generally, and the prospects of every department of trade were brightening. The Bank Act of 1844 had, in his opinion, worked beneficially for the general interests of the country, had brought us through the crisis, and would soon lead to the healthy revival of the supremacy of British commerce. A considerable amount of bullion had come that day from the United States to the reserve of the Bank on the right before was £6,500,000, and the bullion in its coffers was £10,620,000; all apprehension, therefore, of a continuance of severe pressure was at an end; and it was not the intention of the Government to propose any measure on this subject. He concluded a speech of two hours and a half duration by moving the appointment of the Committee

Mr WILSON (editor of the Economist) agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer as to the necessity of appointing a Committee on this subject, but thought that its inquiries should be of a more limited character than that proposed by the Government. The subject referred to it for investigation was inconveniently extensive, and the time of the Committee must be employed, in consequence, on many irrelevant matters. The motion of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would entitle any gentleman to introduce to the Committee any topic which he might deem to be the cause of the existing distress. He thought that the Committee should confine itself to the Bank and the currency. The interference of the Government with the act of 1844 had produced a want of confidence in the law, which required that it should be examined into. Every one was now asking whether the Act of 1844 was to be observed in its integrity, or to be modified according to circumstances, or to be abandoned entirely, and replaced upon new principles. Until being the uncertainty of the public mind, it was fitting that the inquiries into the subject of banking and currency, which were left unfinished by the Committee of 1841, should be resumed. He then entered into an able argument to show that the questions of inconvertibility—of the price of gold, which really had no price—of the usury laws—of the expediency of establishing a double standard, and giving the Bank of England a greater power over the foreign exchanges by compelling it to hold a certain portion of foreign securities, were, one and all, questions which were not further advanced now than they were in 1841. He then entered upon an examination of the circumstances which led to the Bank Act of 1844 was framed, contending that the framers of that Act had been guilty of a great error in confining circulation with capital and currency with bullion. He also entered into an account of the circumstances which took place in the autumn of last and the spring of the present year, for the purpose of showing how incapable the Bank was to manage the circulation. He contended that a bank note, if convertible, could not be depreciated; and that if it could not be depreciated, it could not be issued in excess. He thought that no advantage would be obtained by mixing up with the question of the currency, the question of the causes of commercial distress. He should, therefore, move to erase nearly all the words of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's motion, and to insert, in lieu of them, words which would limit the inquiry to this point. "How far the recent commercial distress has been affected by the laws for regulating the issue of bank notes payable on demand?" He could not hold out to the country any hope that the labour of the Committee would alleviate the present state of things. They must be left to the natural course of events for their restoration, which could not be rapid, on account of the exhaustion under which we were suffering at present. Still it would come at last, and then the prosperity of the country under individual exertions, and under Free Trade, would be exalted to a higher state than any which it had ever yet reached. The hon. member's speech was listened to with the greatest attention.

Mr. BARING seconded the amendment.

Mr. T. BARING denied that the existing pressure was justly attributable either to overtrading or to a want of capital. He likewise denied that the Bank of England had overtraded with the Government deposits, and expressed his surprise that such a charge should have been preferred against it by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who, at the commencement of this year, had so overtraded in Exchequer Bills as to reduce them to a discreditable rate of interest. He then proceeded to show that much evil would have been remedied if the Government letter had been written three weeks earlier, and if the rate of interest had not been fixed so high as 8 per cent.

Mr. G. ROBINSON considered that this proposition for a Committee was a tacit admission that the laws respecting the currency required revision, and that Free Trade was a complete failure. The Committee could lead to no practical good, for he saw no end to it.

Sir W. MOLESWORTH contended that the pecuniary embarrassments of the country were to be attributed to artificial causes, and could not be traced to any deficiency of currency. It was not currency we stood in need of, but capital. We ought therefore to diminish the demand for capital, and to increase the supply of it: and this could only be done by putting a stop to the construction of railways, on which capital was expended, and by attracting it from other countries to Great Britain by the temptation of large interest.

Mr. CAYLEY thought if the commercial difficulties had been occasioned by a deficiency of notes, they would have been relieved at a less cost if Government had interfered earlier. A Committee might be a satisfactory mode of examining into the causes of distress, but it might be granted for several reasons for instance, for the giving "by" to an adverse resolution; and he was almost inclined to think that that was the object of proposing it now, as he had put upon the books a resolution precisely in contradictory of the Act of 1844. He hoped that, if a Committee were appointed, it would institute an unflinching inquiry, and would not be made an instrument for deluding the country with a concocted and preconcerted report.

The debate was then adjourned till Thursday.

HOUSE OF LORDS THURSDAY.

The Earl of SHAFTESBURY, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, took his seat upon the Woolsack shortly after five o'clock.

DEFENCES OF THE COUNTRY.—The Earl of HARDWICKE gave notice of a motion after Christmas on the state of the defences of the country.

DISTRESS OF THE COUNTRY.

The Marquis of LANSDOWNE then moved for a Select Committee to inquire into the causes of the recent commercial distress, and how far it has been affected by the laws for regulating the issue of bank-notes payable on demand The noble Marquis supported his motion by a speech of the same description as that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the other House on Tuesday (see report), ascribing the commercial difficulty to the capital absorbed by railways and the importation of corn.

He was followed by Lord Stanley, Earl Grey, Lord Brougham, Lord Ashburton, and Lord Eglintoun. The motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned at half-past nine o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—TUESDAY.

The House met at four o'clock.

LAW CHARGES AND FEES.—Mr. ROMILLY moved the re-appointment of a Select Committee, to inquire into and report to the House on the taxation of suitors in the courts of law and equity by the collection of fees.—Agreed to.

ADJOURNED DEBATE.

On the order of the day being read for the adjourned debate for the appointment of a Select Committee to enquire into the causes of the late monetary pressure.

Mr. URQUHART addressed the House at considerable length; contending that the causes of distress laid deeper than in the Bank Charter Act. The Legislature were alone to blame for the state of the country. The evils were traceable to the abrogation of useful laws, and the pressing of other measures having a tendency to the frustration of the country

A protracted discussion ensued, in which Mr. Kilice, Mr. Newdegate, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Drummond, Mr. Saunders, and some other hon. gentlemen, took part, and the debate was adjourned.

THE Right Hon. M. O'Ferrall, his family, suite, and servants, in number thirteen persons, embarked on Tuesday morning in her Majesty's steamer Scorpion, and sailed for Malta. The Scorpion is ordered to put into the Tagus to take Capt. Charles Napier to join the Avenger steamer, and Commander Harper to join her Majesty's ship St. Vincent.

THANE VACANCY BY REASON IN PARLIAMENT.—It is said that there is no longer much doubt that a new election will have to take place in the west division of Gloucestershire. The Hon. Grantley Berkeley, in a letter to the papers, states that he is not disposed to impose his qualification; that he has no money to fee counsel; and that he shall defend his seat in Parliament before the committee. The second expected vacancy is one for Sunderland. Mr. David Barclay, M.P., will, it is supposed, shortly apply for the Chiltern Hundreds, and a requisition is now in course of signature to William Arthur Wilkinson, Esq., of Croydon-lodge, the late candidate for this borough, to offer himself to supply the anticipated vacancy. An active canvass is also going on in the Tory interest for Mr. Wilkinson's friends. On the other side it is confidently stated that Mr. Benham is to be put up by Mr. for Lambeth, will be the candidate on the Whig interest, should a vacancy occur; and it is therefore, on pretty good authority, that Mr. Hawes will be supported by the Conservative party in the borough. If this should turn out correct, Mr. Hawes' chance of success will be almost certain. Thirdly, there is to be a new election for Tamworth, in the room of the resignation of Mr. W. Yates Peel, M.P.

A few days since, a person, named Strong, was, by a Judge's order, discharged from Reading gaol, after having been imprisoned nearly seven years, for a debt of £10, increased by costs to £38 15s. He refused to avail himself of the Insolvent Debtors' Act to obtain his liberation.

SWITZERLAND.

THE civil war progresses, and Lucerne, the stronghold of the Sonderbund, has fallen into the hands of the Federal troops. However, we trust to be soon able to announce that the unnatural contest has been arrested, the French Government having acquiesced in the counter-project proposed on behalf of the British Cabinet as the basis of the mediation of the great Powers in the affairs of Switzerland. England and France are about to co-operate in the task of restoring peace to that interesting part of Europe. A protocol or diplomatic convention was signed in London on Friday (last week) by the Duke de Broglie and Lord Palmerston, with the knowledge and concurrence of the Ministers of the Northern Powers in London and Paris; and Sir Stratford Canning has left this country for Neufchatel, taking Paris in his way, for the purpose of urging the Federal authorities of Switzerland to suspend their violent proceedings, to arrest the effusion of blood, and to accept the mediation recommended by the principal Cabinets of Europe to the consideration of both parties in this unhappy war.

The mediation of the five Powers is to be offered to the Swiss Diet and the Sonderbund on the following bases.

"1. That the Catholic Cantons appeal to the Holy See for counsel on the religious differences that divide them.

"2. That the Diet undertake to protect those of the Cantons whose sovereignty is threatened.

"3. The dissolution of the Sonderbund.

"4. General and reciprocal disarmament.

"5. An undertaking not to infringe or in any respect modify the Pact, without the unanimous consent of all the Cantons.

"Should mediation on these bases be accepted, then the representatives of the five Powers will immediately proceed with their work of pacification. If refused, the five Powers will respectively suspend the exercise of their mediatorial mission, and resume their respective positions as if no such proposition had been entered into, and act according to circumstances."

Previous to the capture of Lucerne, which took place on Wednesday, the 24th ult., there had been a good deal of fighting, with loss on both sides; after which, the Government of Lucerne sent to General Dufour, offering to capitulate upon the same terms Fribourg had done. The latter, however, refused this, and called upon them to surrender without conditions, which, it appears, they have done.

The following details of the campaign of the Federal army, previous to the fall of Lucerne, convey some idea of the practical spirit of the troops. On the 22nd ult., the Federal army, consisting of 60,000 men, and 150 cannon, marched against Lucerne, from which it was distant only five or six leagues. The Sonderbund, being compelled to divide its forces to oppose the latter, two columns of 7,000 men each, left to oppose that formidable army. The order of the march of the Federal army, on the 22nd ult., was as follows:—Ziegler's division took the road to Munster, a small town in Lucerne, situated on a stream called the Wynen, at about five leagues from the capital. Donatz's division marched by Sursee. The latter is a town larger than Munster, and is situated on the Suren, to the north of the small lake of Sempach, at the same distance from Lucerne as Munster. Burkhardt's division, which had cooperated at the capture of Fribourg, advanced from Huttwyl to Willisau, passing through the village of Zell. From Willisau it took the road to Ruswyl, which branches off to the road through Sursee, by which it was enabled to form a junction with the division of General Donatz at a league and a half from Lucerne, or by the road which cuts the Emme at Werthenstein, and then march along the right bank of that river through Malters and Littau. It could then form a junction with the column of General Ochsenbein. The names of Malters and of Littau are celebrated by the defeat of the Federal troops. The division of Ochsenbein passed by the road from Entlebuch, which crosses the Emme at its source, and ascends from south to north, as far as Markt, to turn quickly towards the east, right upon Lucerne. At the close of the evening of the 22nd, the Federal army had forced the first line of defence, and every division arrived before Lucerne. According to the Tagblatt of Basle, of the 23rd, the division of General Gmur had, after an obstinate battle of three hours, carried the position of Gisikon, on the frontier of Argau, at two leagues from Lucerne, and passed the Reuss on a bridge of boats which it had thrown over the river. The positions of Roth and of Dierliken, situate on the high road which leads from Gisikon to Lucerne, had been likewise carried, after a desperate resistance. These two villages, and a third, called Honau, were burnt by the fire of the Federal artillery. General Gmur had, moreover, detached considerable forces by the road which runs along the lake, and leads from Kusnacht to Lucerne. After a determined battle, this detachment advanced to Meggen and Halsburg, at a league from Lucerne. It is added that Ziegler's division had likewise passed the Reuss, and advanced on Lucerne by the direct road to Roth. Burkhardt's division, likewise, met serious opposition on the road to Suree; and Ochsenbein's division, after having been beaten at Escholzmatt, had entered the valley of the Emme, and was again beaten at Schupfheim, and driven to the right. The different battles fought during the 22nd and the 23rd ult., present a similar character. After an obstinate resistance, the number and superiority of the Federal artillery had everywhere prevailed against the troops of the Sonderbund. No account had been received of the number of victims sacrificed in this lamentable war, but it must have been great, as the Federals were repulsed twice at Gisikon, and it was only at the third attack that they succeeded in capturing the town. The height called Rothenberg, was fortified with several batteries of cannon, which the Lucernois were obliged to leave in the hands of the troops. On both sides the contest was conducted in a manner worthy of the old reputation of the Swiss nation. In the Convent of Murt there are eighty wounded and twenty killed of the Federal force.

In Lucerne is the celebrated Helvetic lion, sculptured in the solid rock by Thorwaldsen, in commemoration of the slaughter of the Swiss Guards on the memorable 10th of August, 1792. It formed an attractive object of interest to the crowds of troops who thronged the streets after the surrender of the city.

The latest advices confirm the intelligences that the three small cantons of the Sonderbund, Schwytz, Uri, and Unterwald, have been admitted to capitulate, they too are to be occupied by the forces of the Diet. It is reported that the diplomatic conferences of the mediating powers are to be held at Neufchâtel the capital of the Canton of that name.

GENERAL DUFOUR, COMMANDER OF FEDERALIST TROOPS.

The only outstanding Canton of the League at present is the Valais, and the submission of that may be looked for by every courier. The report of the fact of General Salis Saglio being wounded is confirmed. He was wounded in the head by the explosion of a shell. The members of the ex-Government of Lucerne, who carried away the funds of the cantonal Treasury, had signified their desire to return and to restore what had been abstracted. One of them, M. Schopf, had written to the military authorities at Lucerne to that effect.

THE ILLUSTRATIONS.

We annex two views of Fribourg, from sketches by Mr. Charles Vacher Both show the Grande Place of the town, and its principal objects.

Fribourg is situated on a promontory formed by the windings of the Saarine (Saane). Many of the houses stand on the very edge of the precipice overhanging the river, and their quaint architecture, the long line of embattled walls, varied by the chain of feudal watch-towers, and gateways of the ancient fortifications, together with the singular and romantic features of the gorge of the Saarine, give the distant view of the town an aspect different from that of any other in Europe, which is at once imposing and highly picturesque.

Of the interior, our Illustrations will convey an accurate idea. The first is a general view of the Grande Place, and the lower engraving shows the area as seen from the steps of the ancient Rathaus, or Town Hall, built upon the site of the Castle of the celebrated Duke of Zähringen, the founder of the town in 1175. Towards the middle of the Place is a fountain with a twisted column, supporting a small statue of St. George, who is or was one of the patrons of the place. Near the fountain is the celebrated lime-tree, or rather its ancient trunk, planted, according to tradition, on the day of the Battle of Morat, in 1476. The story relates that a young Fribourgois, who had fought in the battle, anxious to bring home the good news, ran the whole distance (ten miles), and arrived on this spot, bleeding, out of breath, and so exhausted, that he fell down, and had barely time to cry "Victory!" ere he expired. The branch of lime which he carried in his hand, was immediately planted, and grew into the tree, of which the decayed trunk, 70 feet in circumference, is the remains; its branches being supported by nine stone pillars. There are, also, stone benches round the trunk, where the old Fribourgois love to congregate on summer evenings.

The Illustration upon the front page represents the Entry of the Federal Troops into Fribourg; and the annexed Portrait, their commander, General Dufour. The details of this movement of the Federalists will be found in our Journals of the 20th and 27th ult.

GRAND PROCESSION OF THE CONSULTA, AT ROME.

We have been so fortunate as to receive from our Artist, at Rome, a spirited sketch of the magnificent Procession which took place at Rome, on Nov. 15, in celebration of the opening of the Consulta on that day.

At nine o'clock in the morning, Cardinal Antonelli, President of the Consulta, and Monsignor Amici, its Vice-President, with the twenty-four Provincial Deputies, arrived at the Quirinal, and took their places in the Hall of the Throne, which the Pope entered shortly afterwards. His Holiness having taken his seat on the Throne, the President addressed to him, in concise but suitable terms, in the name of all present, their homage, and the assurance that they would endeavour, by all means in their power, to respond to the confidence of their Sovereign.

The Pope then replied, thanking those present, assuring them that it was particularly to ascertain the wants of his subjects, and to provide better for the exigencies of the public service, that he had assembled the Consulta in a permanent council. "It was," said his Holiness, "to hear your opinion, when necessary, and to aid me in my sovereign resolutions, in which I shall consult my conscience, and confer on them with my Ministers and the Sacred College. Anybody who would take any other view of the functions you are called to fulfil would mistake materially, as well as he that would see in the Council of State I have created the realization of their own Utopias, and the germ of an institution incompatible with the Pontifical Sovereignty." His Holiness, having pronounced those last words with some vivacity and some heat, stopped a moment, and then resuming his usual mild manner, continued in the following terms:—"This warmth and those words are not addressed to any of you whose social education, Christian and civil probity, as well as the loyalty of your sentiments and the rectitude of your intentions, have been known to me since the moment I proceeded to your election. Neither do those words apply to the majority of my subjects, for I am sure of their fidelity and their obedience. I know that the hearts of my subjects unite with mine in the love of order and of concord. But, there exist, unfortunately, some persons (and though few, they still exist), who, having nothing to lose, love disturbance and revolt, and even abuse the concessions made to them. It is to these that my words are addressed, and let them well understand their signification. In the co-operation of the deputies, I see only the firm support of persons who, devoid of every personal interest, will labour with me, by their advice, for the public good, and who will not be arrested by the vain language of restless men, devoid of judgment. You will aid me with your wisdom to discover that which is most useful for the security of the Throne and the real happiness of my subjects."

After having concluded his speech, the Holy Father admitted the deputies to pay their homage. He then rose, and gave them his benediction, and added that he recommended them to commence their labours with the assistance of Heaven, and that he was sure that those labours would be fruitful in good results, and that they would accomplish the wishes of his heart.

The deputies were afterwards admitted to kiss the feet of the Pope, who, having risen, conferred on them his benediction, and took leave of them in these words:—"Proceed, with the blessing of Heaven, to commence your labours. May they prove fruitful in beneficial results, and conformable to the desires of my heart."

In the meantime, preparations were made in the square of the Quirinal, for a grand procession. Two battalions of the Civic Guard were drawn up with the troops; and these, with twenty-four state carriages, supplied by the Roman nobility for the ceremony, received the deputies; when the cortège moved forward amidst an immense and compact crowd, extending from the Quirinal to the Vatican. All the houses on its passage were decorated with flags bearing the armorial bearings of Rome and the Legations, with a variety of inscriptions and devices. A detachment of dragoons opened the march; next came the carriages of the President and Vice-President of the Consulta, surrounded with the banners of the fourteen wards of Rome, and after them the carriages of the deputies, preceded each by a trophy of the arms of each province, and two standards, on which were inscribed the names of the Legation and its representative. Non-commissioned officers of the Civic Guard walked alongside each carriage, which was followed by numerous deputations of citizens, sent by each province to participate in the great national festivity. The march was closed by a body of Civic Guards, of which Rome admired for the first time the fine appearance and the truly military aspect. The cortège reached the church of St. Peter at noon, and the deputies were ushered to seats reserved to them close to the altar, under the chair of St. Peter. After mass they repaired in the same order to the Vatican, and having entered the hall appointed for their meeting, immediately elected a committee to draw up an address in reply to the Pope's speech, which was composed of Prince Odescalchi, and Messrs. Minghetti, Paolucci, and Silvani. That committee having retired to an adjoining hall, returned shortly afterwards with the draught of that document, which obtained the sanction of the assembly.

Our Artist secured a good place to view the pageant, in a house opposite the bridge of St. Angelo; he adds, the streets through which it passed were decorated as during the Carnival; and velvet, silk, and tapestry being hung from the windows and balconies: together with flags, banners, and wreaths and festoons of flowers. The people were all dressed in their holiday clothes; in fact, it was a fête day. The Pope's immense banner waved from the Castle of St. Angelo, and the crowd upon the bridge was very dense.

The deputations of the different states of Italy, and the European residents, and their banners, were absent from the procession, it is said from a quarrel between the English and French Ambassadors as to precedence, when that portion of the programme was omitted.

In the evening, however, amidst the general illumination of the city and the immense crowd which filled the Corso, the excluded banners were carried about by a band of young men, and saluted with deafening cheers. The British flag figured amongst them, next to the Italian national colours, green, white, and red, to which had been added, as at Florence, a yellow stripe in honour of the Pope, and a red cross. Those young men repaired in succession to the palaces of the Ministers of Sardinia and Tuscany. The latter presented himself on his balcony, holding in his hand the Tuscan flag, and addressed a few words of thanks to the people, which were received with enthusiasm. They then proceeded to the residence of Lord Minto, who came forward and cried, "Viva the Italian League, Pius IX., Italy and Italian Independence," amidst loud and continued applause.

Prince Torlonia opened his splendid theatre for a brilliant ball, at which the citizens of all ranks were admitted. Most of the men were the uniform of the Civic Guard. The deputies, on entering their boxes, were loudly cheered. The Minister of Tuscany, dressed in his full uniform, and Lord Minto, were likewise saluted with enthusiasm.

THE ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.

LONDON, SATURDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1847.

The Government measure for the protection of life in Ireland was introduced on Monday evening; the case made out by the Secretary of State was, unhappily, but too strong, and the measure itself being milder than could be anticipated, the opposition was, as it is to be hoped the peasant assassins will be, disarmed. There can be no effectual resistance to a bill that does not trench on the Constitution, and contains the smallest amount of coercion an Executive in such circumstances could well ask for. The majority is decisive; all parties combine to stop bloodshed, and Mr. John O'Connell, so far from dying on the floor of the House, lived through the night, and gave the bill his qualified support in terms which the more fiery Feargus O'Connor could describe as adulation of the Ministry! Thus supported by all, and resisted by none, the Government measure will soon be the law of the land.

And, yet, while giving full consent to it, everybody feels that it is unsafe to trust to the bill for any permanent result; it may be the means of preventing some dreadful evils, but lasting good none expect from it; it is an expedient, not a policy; the saddening fact ever presenting itself that previous Coercion Bills have left behind the same work to be done over again. There has scarcely been a Secretary of State for the last forty years who has not had to deliver an address similar in all respects to the speech of Sir George Grey on Monday night. The names and dates only are altered; the bloody facts are all of the same dread family, proving that there are whole districts in Ireland where

> One spirit of the first-born Cain
> Pervades all bosoms;

and that the spirit has never been eradicated by this kind of legislation. Sir Robert Peel has twice in his career resorted to it; the Grey Ministry passed one of the most stringent Coercive Acts ever known; further back, there pass in Parliamentary history with shocking regularity. They are effectual for a time, but they always leave an impression behind that something else and something different is needed. Even in themselves, they are likely to be relied on for more than they can effect; while the souls of men are perverted to the mood of the savage, it is useless to deprive them of arms; it is the temper of the people that is to be dreaded; if that is exasperated to the pitch of bloodshed, the physical means of destroying life are countless, and can never be guarded against by any law whatever. We are vulnerable to the simplest instruments of violence. The very first murder on record was committed before any weapon was forged; and there is everywhere a terrible facility in finding the means of homicide. The Poet graphically tells us how little suffices for the murderer's purpose.

> Two sudden blows with a ragged stick,
> And one with a heavy stone, one pull
> One hurried gash with a hasty knife,
> And then the deed was done;
> There was nothing lying at my foot
> But lifeless flesh and bone.

Supposing an Arms Act carried out in Ireland, with the utmost success of which such a law is capable; suppose all the fire-arms and warlike weapons exclusively in the hands of those who would never use them in crime; it still leaves to the semi-savage peasant the arms of the barbarian—clubs and stones. In fact, it is impossible to deprive men of the means of offence and destruction; the very implements of husbandry the peasant uses in his daily toil are among the most formidable of weapons. Some of the most frightful murders in Ireland have been committed with the spade. In the Rebellion of 1745, the weapon most dreaded by the English soldiers was the scythe of the Highlanders fixed on a pole. It may even be doubted whether fire-arms are really among the weapons most to be dreaded. Attempts at murder more frequently fail with them than with weapons of another class, that can be better concealed, and give less alarm; of this fact, Louis Philippe is a living proof. The stiletto of Italy and Spain is more deadly than the musket.

There may be something repulsive to the feelings in thus coolly calculating the relative properties of weapons; but, when a law is about to be relied on, which the possession of arms is made a crime, in order to secure protection to those whose lives are endangered, it is absolutely necessary to analyse the subject thoroughly. There is a peril in trusting too much to legislation, which is nowhere so great as in Ireland, where all classes seem to expect the Government can do everything. From the appeals made to it, it would appear as if the general notion of a Government was that of some mysterious omnipotent body, which had only to will and it was, and all evils would cease. In reality, a Government is as weak as the society it rules: for physical ends, it can act on the instant; but, for moral changes, it, like society, must wait. There is no human legislation that can give Tipperary the peace and prosperity of Kent. A remote approach to it will only be the work of time and circumstances. To coerce the criminal is the first step, but it is the least; the difficulty is so to change the social state that fosters crime, that violence shall be the exception, not the rule; that the assassin shall find every man's hand against him; that he shall be hunted down without mercy, instead of meeting protection. Far other measures than Arms Acts are required for this; and what we dread is seeing legislation stop short at this first stage, as it has so often done before. But the sense of peril to the State is uniting the efforts of parties long opposed to each other; and we have great hopes the Government will not be content with restoring something like quiet and security, but that they will try and turn them to advantage.

THE WEATHER.

The weather during the past week, till Wednesday, was dull; the sky had been, for the most part, clouded, and rain had frequently fallen; the air had been in gentle motion, and nearly saturated with moisture; on Wednesday and Thursday, the weather was fine.

The following are some particulars of each day:—

Thursday, the sky was generally covered with cirrostratus and send throughout the day; the direction of the wind was S.S.W., and the average temperature of the day was 45°; and that for the week ending this day was 41½°. Friday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and rain was falling during the greater part of the day; the direction of the wind was S.W., and the average temperature of the day was 43°. Saturday, the sky was overcast throughout the day, and rain was falling till the evening; the air was in a calm state, and the average temperature for the day was 44°. Sunday, the sky was covered with cirrostratus all day, and rain was falling frequently till the evening; the direction of the wind was W., but light, and the average temperature of the day was 49°. Monday, the sky was frequently partially covered by cloud; at times it was clear, and it was cloudless during the evening; the direction of the wind was W., the day was fine, and its average temperature was 49½°. Tuesday, the sky was overcast all day, and rain was falling frequently; the average temperature for the day was 49½°. Wednesday, December 1, the sky was, for the most part, cloudless throughout the day; the direction of the wind was W., and the average temperature for the day was 46°. Thursday, the sky, during the morning, was partially clear, and it was mostly covered by cloud after noon; the direction of the wind was W.; the average temperature for the day was 40°, and that for the week ending this day was 44½°.

The extreme thermometrical readings for each day were:—

Thursday,	Nov. 25, the highest during the day was	54 deg.,	and the lowest was	44 deg.
Friday,	Nov. 26	.....	45	 39
Saturday,	Nov. 27	.....	49½	 39

Tuesday,	Nov. 30	.....	50	 45
Wednesday,	Dec. 1	.....	54	 38
Thursday,	Dec. 2	.....	50	 31

The average temperature of the air for the month of November was 56°, being about 3° in excess above its usual value.

The average temperature of Evaporation for November was 44·7

The average temperature of the Dew Point for November was 43·0.

The average daily range of temperature for November was 11°0.

The average amount of water suspended in the atmosphere, in the invisible shape of vapour, was such that if all had been precipitated at one time, water to the depth of four inches would have been produced; and this water balanced a column of mercury to the height of 0·294 inch, and was so spread that there were on gr. 4 in. cubic foot of air. The degree of humidity of the atmosphere for November was 90, where complete saturation would be represented by 100

The Earl of Shaftesbury, in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, took his seat upon the Woolsack at five o'clock.

Commercial Distress.—The Marquis of Lansdowne moved the nomination of the following Committee to consider the commercial distress:—The Duke of Richmond, Earl Grey, Earl of Auckland, Marquis of Salisbury, Lord Ashburton, Lord Brougham, Earl of Ellenborough, Earl St. Germans, Lord Glenelg, Lord Beaumont, Earl Granville, Lord Ardrossan, Lord Kinnaird, Lord Wharncliffe, Marquis of Cantercorle, Lord Stanley, Lord Monteagle, Lord Campbell, and the Marquis of Lansdowne.—Agreed to.

Outrages in Ireland.—On the motion of Lord Montagle, a return was ordered of the number of outrages committed in Ireland between the month of May, 1845, and Nov. 1845.

Irish Coercion Bill.—The Duke of Richmond moved for a return of the number of persons tried under the Insurrection Act, passed on the 3d April, 1833.—Agreed to.

Their Lordships then adjourned.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.—FRIDAY.

The Admission of Jews.—Sir R. H. Inglis presented two petitions, one of which was from Whitney, Oxfordshire, against the admission of Jews into Parliament.

Arresting Members of Parliament.—An Hon. Member presented a petition from Great Yarmouth against Members of Parliament being allowed to claim the privilege of freedom from arrest in civil cases.

Ireland.—Mr. Scholefield presented a petition from the Birmingham Chamber of Commerce, against coercive measures, and praying the House to pass a bill to place the relations of landlords and tenants upon a better footing than heretofore, and to pass a bill to facilitate the sale of encumbered estates.

Liability of Tenants to Pay Rates.—Mr. S. Crawford gave notice of his intention to bring forward a bill to relieve the tenants in Ireland from liability to pay their landlords' rates, and to make provision otherwise.

Chancery Bills of Costs.—Mr. George Hamilton moved for a return of the amount of Chancery bills of costs handed over by the Masters in Chancery to the taxing master appointed under the Act 8 and 9 Vic., c. 115, in Ireland, since the 3d day of July, 1846; also a return of the number of bills of costs (omitting the usual charge receivers' accounts) lodged in the office of such taxing master, since the 3rd day of July, 1846, and the number now remaining therein, under taxation or untaxed; also a return of the average length of time intervening between the delivery of a summons to tax a bill of costs in the said office, and the commencement of its taxation, so far as such average can be conveniently ascertained, and the cause of the delay, if any, in commencing such taxation, and of the amount of Chancery fund duty paid on the costs which have been certified.—Agreed to.

Railway Bills.—On the motion of Lord J. Russell, the House then went into Committee on this measure; and the several clauses, after a short discussion, having been agreed to, the House resumed.

COMMERCIAL DISTRESS. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

The Marquis of Granby resumed the adjourned debate, contending that the monetary system established under the Bank Charter Act of 1844 was destructive to the best interests both of this country and the colonies, and demanded immediate amendment.

Mr. F. T. Baring approved of the course that had been taken by the Government in addressing the letter of the 25th of October to the Bank Authorities. He lamented that the necessity for such a course should arise; but there remained no alternative but either a violation of the act or a strict adherence to it, accompanied by a state of danger and difficulty which required more rashness than courage to leave untouched.

A somewhat lengthened discussion followed, in which the oft-repeated arguments for and against Sir R. Peel's Banking Act of 1844 were again reiterated, and the House adjourned

THE EMPEROR OF RUSSIA.—On the 1st of December, the Emperor of Russia completed the twenty-second year of his reign; in three years, therefore, he will have arrived at an epoch which has never been attained by any of the Czars before him. A fundamental law exists in Russia, which dates before the time of Peter the Great, and by which the Emperor of Russia cannot reign more than twenty-five years. After this period he is obliged to abdicate in favour of the heir presumptive of the Imperial Crown; or, if he wants to maintain himself on the throne, he does so at the risk of braving all the aristocracy of Russia, and of being shorter or strangled in his own palace

British Anti-State Church Association.—On Thursday, a public meeting of the inhabitants of Clapham, Tooting, Mitcham, Wandsworth, Putney, and places adjacent, was held in the large hall of the Greyhound, Lower Tooting, to consider the claims of the British Anti-State-Church Association, for the liberation of religion from all State interference. The attendance was very large, many influential inhabitants of those districts being present. Josiah Conder, Esq., presided; and the Rev. J. Burnett, of Camberwell, and Mr. Carvell Williams, attended as a deputation from the society to explain its objects and its scheme of organization. Speeches were made and resolutions adopted in furtherance of the objects of the meeting, which then separated.

The Robbery of Dr. Bowring.—Upon the assembling of the magistrates of the Petty Sessions, held at the Town-hall, Greenwich, on Tuesday, it was stated to their worships that a great portion of the property, consisting chiefly of notes and gold, which had been taken from the person of Dr. Bowring, M.P., in the late highway robbery on Blackheath, on the 1st last, had been traced, and four persons taken into custody. Upon being placed in the dock, the prisoners severally gave their names as Evan Evans, Richard Thomas, William Llewellen, and John Llewellen, all Welshmen, from the evidence, it appeared that two of the prisoners, Evans and Thomas, were on Thursday last drinking at the Union public-house, and in the course of the evening they changed several £5 notes, a circumstance which excited suspicion on the part of the landlord, who gave information to the police. The Bench asked the prisoner Evans how he accounted for the possession of the notes and money, to which he replied that he found a number of £5 notes on the road, after the robbery, and returned to Dr. Bowring, who gave him six £5 notes for his trouble. The other prisoners denied all knowledge, and the Bench remanded them for the attendance of Dr. Bowring.

Tottenham Distillery at Fire of the Arms Tavern, Hammersmith.—On Thursday morning, shortly before two o'clock, a fire, involving a serious destruction of property, and it is feared fatal consequences to one of the inmates, broke out upon the extensive range of premises known as the City Arms Tavern, situate at the water-side, near Hammersmith-bridge. After considerable trouble the residents were made sensible of the danger to which they were exposed, and with the exception of Mr. Beaumont, junior, and another man, they escaped without receiving any personal injury. The other too, however, on getting on to the staircase were nearly overpowered by the intense heat, and seeing that all escape by the regular means was cut off, they re-entered their bed-rooms on the second floor, and having opened their windows, Mr. Beaumont's son jumped out, receiving a severe cut on the right foot. The other poor fellow, in jumping from the window, fell with fearful violence on his head, and was picked up in an insensible state; it is doubtful whether he will ever recover. The firemen were unable to get the mastery over the destructive element before the building was burned down.

The Sligo election inquiry has ended in the acquittal of the Mayor, the Lord-Lieutenant stating, in giving his decision through the Under Secretary, "that, although it is to be regretted that measures were not taken by sustaining a protective force in the more immediate vicinity of the hustings, for preventing the disgraceful scene which took place on the occasion you refer to, at the same time the Executive does not consider the charge of determined partizanship against the Mayor, or that his conduct was partial and corrupt, is not borne out by the evidence."

Jeremiah Dunne is to be the new Lord Mayor of Dublin. He was unanimously elected on Wednesday.

State of Ireland.—Another murder on the Great Southern and Western line of railway occurred on Monday last, from the account of the former, the victim, too, being of the same class. The murdered man was named John Roarke, "a gauger." He was killed on the 23rd ult., near Templemore. His brains were dashed out with the butt end of a gun, which he assailed him with stones. He has left a wife and two young children.—Another case, which is likely to result in murder, was perpetrated near Borrisokane, and is the murder positively stated in the Nenagh Guardian, however, not yet dead. It is said that a sharp stone was embedded in his skull. The unfortunate man was proceeding home in company with three others, when a dispute arose, and they assailed him together. The three are in custody. Another has been also arrested and lodged in gaol for the murder of Mr. Anthony Burke, near Borrisoleigh, Tipperary, four years since. This atrocious act created great sensation at the time. Timothy Hogan, the murderer, and the two sons of the gang, are also in custody. This looks like a symptom of the break-up of these small confederations. Mr. Bailey is going on favourably. Mayo, which has not fortunately been stained with blood, would seem preparing for mischief. Nine hundred pounds of powder have been stolen from stores belonging to the Board of Works at Kilmain.—The Cavan Board of Guardians has been dissolved.

The St. Petersburg Journal of the 18th ult., publishes an Imperial ukase for contracting abroad a loan of fourteen millions of silver roubles, for the works of the St. Petersburg and Moscow Railroad in 1848. The same journal adds that this loan is to be at 4 per cent, and the Russian Minister of Finances has judged it advisable to take such measures of the above loan for the account of the "Caisse de bdiets de credit de l'Etat," as the heavy expense attendant on the purchase abroad of foreign funds will be thus avoided. Consequently, the sum to be realised for the said plan will be in reality only six millions of silver rubles.

TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF NETLEY-PLACE BY FIRE. This fine mansion, formerly the seat of Edmund Shakespeare Lomax, Esq., now the property of J. Frazer, Esq., who married a daughter of the late Lord Sondes, was totally destroyed by fire on the morning of Wednesday the 24th ult. Soon after the alarm was given, a man rode to Guilford for the assistance of an engine, but was unsuccessful in obtaining one. The engine was despatched at once to the scene of the conflagration by a messenger, but too late to be of any service. The interior of the house had undergone great improvement, and was decorated at a vast expense, about £3000; and the house itself was in the entire care of Mr. Cubitt's man, and not a servant was left in it.

The death of the Vicar of Ashford, the Rev. Thomas Wood, took place very suddenly Tuesday evening. An extraordinary communication was received from London, by the Mayor of Oxford, on Tuesday morning, and by him has been submitted to the Members of the Town Council, who were met in committee for a public object. The communication in question was signed by a leading Tractarian, inviting the Mayor to procure an address from the City Council against the election of Dr. Hampden to the See of Hereford. A copy of the proposed address was sent, but it was a great miscalculation to send such papers to Oxford, where Dr. Hampden is known, and where the cause of the enmity of the Tractarian party to the Regius Professor is also known. The universal feeling in Oxford city is that of respect and affection for Dr. Hampden.

Accordingly, when the officer recently attempted to eject him from a house in which he had been disorderly, Cann drew a clasped knife, and stabbed him twice in the breast, near the heart, and ran away. He was fully committed to Shepton Mallet gaol, to take his trial for the capital offence.

DISCOVERY OF MURAL PAINTINGS. At the meeting of the British Archæological Association, on Friday evening last, it was announced that Mr. F. Bargent, one of the members, had brought to light, from beneath the whitewash on the eastern wall of Silkstede's Chapel, in Winchester Cathedral, a well-executed group of figures, representing the Saviour calling to Him St. Peter on the sea. The face of the Saviour has been, at some former period, intentionally chipped out; but the other portions of the painting are pretty perfect, and exhibit in parts considerable artistic skill, particularly in the drapery. The group is surmounted by an elegant canopy, from which Mr. Bargent has not yet removed the whitewash.

During the past week no fewer than 1888 patients had applied, being an unparalleled number in the history of the charity since its institution in 182-. This hospital is entirely free, poverty and disease being the only requisites for admission.

THE SCOTTISH HOSPITAL.—On Tuesday, being St. Andrew's Day, the annual Court of the Governors of the Scottish Hospital was held at the hall of the Corporation, Crane-court, Fleet-street, to receive the report for the past year. The Chisholm in the chair. Major Adair, the Secretary, having stated the amount stated that during the past quarter 6337 destitute sick persons had been relieved. PARISH OF ST. PANCRAS.—THE ABOLITION OF TOLL-BARS. At a very numerous meeting of the vestry of Saint Pancras, held on Wednesday, in the new vestry-rooms, adjoining the workhouse, King's-road, Camden-town, Mr. R. Goodwin in the chair, Mr. Chamberlain Howarth brought forward a motion for the abolition of toll-bars. He said that two miles of old turnpike-road which had been thrown upon the parish, had cost nearly £4000, and the gentleman out of doors succeeded in getting rid of the turnpikes from the other six miles, and throwing that amount of road upon the parish, the result would be a cost of £4000 or £5000 per year, and thus there would be imposed at least an additional rate of 2d. in the pound Mr Howarth moved the following resolutions, which were unanimously carried "That the transfer of the repairs of the public turnpike-roads of the kingdom from the public at large to the inhabitants of the parishes through which they happen to pass would impose a most onerous and unjust burden upon those particular parishes, to the entire loss of the inhabitants of all other parishes equally benefited by and interested in the maintenance of such roads; and that, in the event of levying tolls for the repairs of such roads being abolished, the burden of maintaining such roads would be borne either by the inhabitants of counties, or the entire kingdom. That this vestry pledges itself to oppose any scheme for charging the parishioners of St. Pancras with the repairs of any portion of the turnpike-roads throughout the parish" The vestry then elected two persons to act as summoning officers to the Coroner

DOMESTIC SERVANTS' BENEVOLENT INSTITUTION.—A meeting of the committee and supporters of the above society, was held at their offices in Sackville-street on Wednesday afternoon. The report stated that the society had only been formed last year, and that the progress made was of a most gratifying description, there being at present upwards of 1600 members, and £1000 invested, besides £200 with a balance in the hands of the bankers of above £100. The objects of the society are to provide annual pensions from £5 to £20 per annum for aged and infirm members, and to grant temporary relief on other peculiar occasions

ASSOCIATION FOR THE RELIEF OF THE POOR OF THE CITY.—The ANNUAL Meeting was held in the course of the week, at the London Coffee House, Ludgate-hill. The Lord Mayor presided The Secretary read the report of the Committee. During that period, 27,988 cwts. of coals had been delivered, at the rate of 6d. for every 1-2 lbs. The amount of coal distributed exceeded that of the previous year by 110 tons, and that of the year 1846 by 389 tons. Having commenced with only £7 6s. 2d. in hand, and having been under the necessity of incurring a considerable increase of expenditure, in order to avoid closing the kitchen at a period which the friends of the poor would have deemed exceedingly inopportune, the Committee had incurred a debt of £171, and this notwithstanding the aid of the Corporation to the extent of £200. They trusted, however, to the public for a furnish means to enable them to liquidate the claims upon them. The receipts for the past year, including £300 which had been borrowed, amounted to £2261 9s. 8d., out of which a cash balance remained of £2 4s. 6d. The amount of the loan, £200 had been repaid, and the remainder, with some other matters, made the present debt £171. The report was adopted on the motion of Mr Alderman Wilson

A CABINET COUNCIL was held at three o'clock on Saturday afternoon, at Lansdowne-House. The Ministers present were, Lord John Russell, the Marquis of Lansdowne, Sir George Grey, Sir Charles Wood, Baronet, Chancellor of the Exchequer, the Earl of Auckland, Sir John Hobhouse, the Right Hon. H. Labouchere, Lord Campbell, Viscount Morpeth, the Marquis of Clanricarde, and the Right Hon. T. B. Macaulay. The Council broke up shortly before six o'clock.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS.—The following gentlemen, having undergone the necessary examinations for the diploma of the College, were admitted members at the meeting of the Council for examiners, on the 26th ult., viz.:—Messrs. Robert Dowell, Redcar, Yorkshire; Henry William Hayward Richardson, Chilmark, Wiltshire; Michael Thomas Mason, Newington, Surrey; Thomas Henry Mitchell, Kington, Herefordshire; Joseph Marshall, Tynemouth, Northumberland; Edward Stride, Steerness; George Fletcher Banks, Sherston, Wiltshire; John Robinson, Carlisle, and Thomas Smith, Whiteley, Oxfordshire. At the above meeting of the Court, Mr. Philip Porter passed his examination for naval surgeon.

COURT OF LIEUTENANCY OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—The Commission for holding a Court of Lieutenancy, and a list of the Deputy Lieutenants or Lieutenancy of the City of London, have been just issued to the Commission. At the conclusion of the last mayoralty, the Commissioners assembled in the Council-Chamber, for the purpose of being sworn in. The clerk was then commission, which revokes all former Commissions, states (and the statement throws some light upon by-gone times) that the Commissioners have been appointed for suppressing all insurrections and rebellions, and repelling all invasions, that may happen within the City of London and its liberties, and all privileged places within the limits and precincts of the same, as they may happen, according as they from time to time receive directions from our Majesty. . . . That the Commissioners are to have full power and authority to call together the London militia, at such times, and in arm and array then, and form them into companies, troops, and regiments, and in case of insurrection, rebellion, or invasion, to lead and conduct them for the quelling of the same. Sir C. S. Hunter is the Colonel of the Court, of which there are two majors and thirty members, according to the new Commission.

RESIGNATION OF HIS GOWN BY ALDERMAN T. WOOD. It was signified on Saturday to the Constables of Aldermen sitting at Guildhall, that Alderman Thomas Wood intended to resign his gown; and a Court of Aldermen were summoned to receive his resignation. A great deal of sympathy is felt for Mr. Wood, in consequence of the death of his most amiable and respected wife, and the pecuniary difficulties in which he is unfortunately involved.

RETURN OF MR. JOHN WILLIAMS, M.P. FOR MACCLESFIELD.—DINNER. The countrymen and fellow-parishioners of this hon. gentleman, who is a native of the principality of Wales, and who has for some years past been an active member of the Marylebone Vestry, celebrated his election, on Wednesday, by a banquet at the London Tavern. About 130 of the electors of the borough of Macclesfield and of the county of Middlesex were present. The chair was filled by Sir B. Hall, Bart., M.P., who was supported by Lord Dudley Stuart, M.P., H. Bernal Osborne, Esq., M.P., G. Thompson, Esq., M.P., &c. &c.

TRANSFERENCE OF PAINTINGS. The preservation of the paintings on plaster, with which certain of the ceilings in the old rooms of the British Museum were decorated, being deemed impracticable or not desirable, they were given up to destruction, and were for the most part knocked to pieces. A modeller named Dowling, however, being anxious to save some of them, applied himself to trace for groups to canvass, chiefly from the library, and has succeeded admirably. With a paste composed of equal quantities of boiled oil, flour paste, and glue, he fastened a cloth to the whole surface of the painting proposed to be removed, and formed a framework in front, to support the painted plaster when loosened from the wall behind. He then saw away the entire brick-work of the centre wall to which the plaster was attached, and, with scrapers, gradually removed the plaster from the back of the picture till the colour began to show, leaving a surface of about the thickness of a penny piece. With a similar paste to that first mentioned, the painting was fastened to canvass stretched on a frame, and the picture being freed from the cloth on the face of it by the application of warm water, was covered around with size and water, and the work was complete.

THE INFLUENZA.—In London and its neighbourhood influenza greatly prevails. It has proved extensively fatal. The returns of the Registrar-General of Deaths, &c., for the week ending Nov. 27, show a great increase of mortality in the metropolis, in comparison to the corresponding season, which has averaged 1046 for the last five years. But there died in London and its vicinity, during the past week no fewer than 1077 individuals, or 63,—about 60 per cent above the average. The table showing the causes of death exhibits the greatest increase of casualties from bronchitis and pneumonia, diseases closely allied to what is popularly termed influenza. It is rumoured that deaths have occurred in Greenwich Hospital during the last fortnight at the rate of twenty per diem, out of a total number of about 2000 pensioners.

OBITUARY OF EMINENT PERSONS RECENTLY DECEASED.

SIR JOHN MACPHERSON BRACKENBURY, KNIGHT.

SIR JOHN MACPHERSON BRACKENBURY, Knt., who died on the 29th ultimo, in the 69th year of his age, was eldest son of the late Richard Brackenbury, Esq., of Aswardby, county Lincoln, by his marriage with Miss Janetta Young, of Edinburgh, and descended immediately from Sir Robert Brackenbury, the famous Lieutenant of the Tower, temp. Richard the Third. The De Brackenburys were founded in England by Sir Peras de Brackenbury, one of the companions in arms of William the Conqueror. Sir John, who served in early life in the Light Dragoons, filled the office of English Consul at Cadiz for many years, and received the honour of Knighthood from her Majesty on his retirement in 1840. He had previously, in 1830, been invested with the insignia of the Guelphic Order, and for a short period was Consul for the King of Hanover, for the province of Andalusia. The deceased Knight married, in 1801, Miss Nicholson, daughter of William Nicholson, Esq. He was elder brother of Lieut.-Col. Sir Edward Brackenbury, Knt., of Skendleby House, county Lincoln.

THE HONOURABLE SAMUEL HAY

THIS gentleman, a captain in the army, and Equerry to Queen Adelaide, died on the 25th ultimo, at Cuffe Hall, Wiltshire, in his forty-first year. He was the third son of William, fifteenth Earl of Errol, by Alicia, his second wife, daughter of Samuel Kilt, Esq., of Antigua, and grandson of James, Earl of Errol, who officiated as Constable of Scotland, at the Coronation of George the Third, in 1761. During the ceremony it is related that his Lordship, neglecting, by accident, to pull off his cap when the King entered, apologised for the omission in the most respectful manner, but his Majesty entreated him to be covered, adding, "that he looked on his presence at the solemnity as a very particular honour."

Captain Hay, whose death we record, was born the 9th January, 1807; and married, in 1832, Louisa, only child of the Hon. Captain Duncombe Pleydell Bouverie, R.N., by whom he leaves no issue. His eldest brother, James, Lord Hay, fell gallantly at Waterloo, and thus the succession to the honours opened to the next brother, William George, late Earl of Errol.

THE DOWAGER LADY DYKE.

HER Ladyship died on the 27th ultimo, at Devonshire-place, aged seventy two. She was daughter of Robert Jenners, Esq., of Chislehurst, Kent, and widow of Sir Percival Hart Dyke, Baronet, of Lullingstone Castle, by whom she had no less than thirteen children, the eldest being the present Sir Percival Hart Dyke, Bart.

OPENING OF THE TRENT VALLEY RAILWAY.

THIS line of railway, which was opened to the public on Wednesday is an important portion of the iron highway of communication; as it will shorten the time occupied in the journey between London and Liverpool, and all the great cities and towns in the North, nearly one hour.

The Trent Valley line runs from the North Western line, at Rugby, and passing Tamworth, Lichfield, &c., joins the North Western line again at Stafford: thus preventing the delay and inconveniences incident to shifting the carriages from one line of rail to another.

From Rugby, the line runs on an embankment, and crosses the river Avon on a viaduct, the arches of which are thirty feet span. This viaduct is the subject of one of our Illustrations; and we may here observe that there are other viaducts on the line, over the rivers Anker and Trent, and Bricklow Brook; and, in all, the arches are of the same span.

The station at Bulkington is a neat red brick erection, with stone dressings; that at Nuneaton is stone-fronted, and in architectural arrangement similar to that at Tamworth, the platform being paved with red, black, and yellow tiles. Indeed, the general character of the stations is much the same; the only difference being that the first-class stations are larger, and more elaborated in outline, than the smaller ones. The piquant Tudor or Elizabethan style has been adopted in all; and, perhaps, no style is so well adapted for buildings in which domestic accommodation is to be studied. It likewise harmonises thoroughly with English scenery.

At Atherstone, the line crosses the old coach-road. This and the next station, Polesworth, are minor stations; and the next in due order is Tamworth, on nearing which place the fine old church is a noble object in the view; and the country round, being rather pretty, the effect is greatly increased.

The Tamworth Station is a very handsome and picturesque building, as the View we give of it, and which shows the frontage to the rail, will prove. Its gables, bay windows, clustered chimneys, and roof covered with tiles of quaint form, are all in excellent taste. The frontage of the building towards the rail extends to one hundred and thirty-five, and the platform to three hundred, feet. In this latter respect, all the first-class stations are alike.

At the Birmingham and Derby Railway crosses the Trent line at Tamworth, that portion of the station adjoining the Derby line is appropriated for its office, and may be recognised in our View from its being more lofty than the other portion of the building. The station is about three quarters of a mile distant from the town of Tamworth.

At Lichfield, where the magnificent and lofty spires of the cathedral arrest attention, the station is a small but neat erection of red brick. The works here are being enlarged, and at no very distant day will appear more important than they do at present.

Rugeley Station, which forms the subject of another of our Illustrations, stands in an open place, close to the old coach-road to Uttoxeter, and faces the town or Rugeley.

The old roadway passes under the line, which is on a lofty embankment. The station is of pleasing design, stone-fronted, and has all the variety of outline so essential to the true spirit of the Tudor style of architecture. The buildings to this station have about 1-2 a mile of frontage to the line.

The station at Colwich is situated near the church, and adjoining a beautifully wooded estate belonging to the Earl of Lichfield. In the grounds, the Railway Company have erected a stone bridge over a roadway, and the armorial bearings of the noble Earl form the decorations of it.

On nearing Stafford, the railway passes through a tunnel in Thurgborough Park, seven hundred and seventy-nine yards in length. The north face of the tunnel, which is represented in one of our Views, is a very striking architectural composition. It consists of a noble archway, deeply moulded, flanked by two square towers, the whole surmounted by a battlemented parapet, resting on arched corbel-tables. The lofty trees, clothed with the richest foliage, rising from the elevated ground through which the tunnel is pierced, give a depth of tone and artistic effect to the whole scene, at once peculiarly imposing and beautiful, and it is a remarkably fine feature in the scenery of the valley. Emerging from the tunnel, the town of Stafford is soon reached, where the line sweeps into the North Western again, as before mentioned.

The works throughout the Trent Valley line are of the most substantial character of construction, and reflect great credit on all engaged on them; and the architect of the stations, Mr. Livock, deserves much praise for the elegance and character of his designs.

To Mr. Watkins, the secretary of the line, our thanks are due for the assistance he has kindly given our Artist in our Illustrations.

An occurrence, of considerable importance in a national point of view, took place on Wednesday, when the mail and other trains between London, Liverpool, Manchester, and the north, were, in consequence of the completion of the through communication, placed upon the above Railway, instead of going round by Birmingham. This involved the alteration of clocks throughout the country: the plan resorted to was that of sending special messengers, each having a chronometer indicating true Greenwich time, to the several divisions of the London and North-Western and Midland systems, so that Greenwich and London time, in the course of the day, was communicated and established at every station on these lines, amounting to between 200 to 300, and affecting all the principal towns between London and Carlisle and London and York. The authorities of the Post-office have given official notification to the local postmaster at Liverpool to adjust the Post-office clock there in accordance with London time, and it is intended that the same shall be the case at Manchester. The Post office mails are always regulated according to London, and not local, time; and the present alteration is found to be expedient, in consequence of the inconveniences asserted to arise from the fact of every separate town having its own time with reference to the longitude of the particular place E. or W. of Greenwich. The chief object of the proposed alteration is stated to be that of rendering the movements of the railway system more precise as to London time, and of enabling travellers from the East and from the West meeting at some common centre, each with a timepiece in his pocket, to be able to keep their appointments without first consulting the longitude of the town clock. When all the electric wires are complete, and the local clocks correctly set, there will be a uniformity in striking of hours throughout the country.

PARLIAMENTARY PORTRAITS.—No. III.

JAMES WILSON, M.P.

Among the many proofs of an eminently practical mind which Mr. Cobden has given in the course of his career, is a piece of sound advice he dropped in his last public address—"The secret of speaking well is never to talk except on a question you understand." This is a golden rule, which members of the House of Commons should take as their great guide on the noisy road of political life. It would save many hours of precious time, shorten the discussions, and much abbreviate that process, the object of which is to get at results. In another form, Mr. Cobden's maxim was laid down by a legislator of a time gone by, to whose name we have done the injustice of forgetting it: taxed for silence by somebody who knew his ability, he replied, "I only join the debate when it walks past my door."

The debate on Tuesday evening walked past Mr. Wilson's door, and he most promptly joined it, accompanied it for a considerable part of its journey, and rendered it very effectual assistance. In a word, the subject being Currency, Banking, and Trade, Mr. Wilson—well known as the editor of the Economist, and in all probability destined yet to be still better known as the member for Westbury—made one of the most effective speeches on the question the Legislature has ever heard. There is no assembly in the world where merit is so readily acknowledged, where it has so fair a chance of rising, as in the House of Commons. It is the fashion of a particular set of writers to throw doubt on the fact, and to paint the Lower House as an intolerant bear-garden, in which factions groan, cough, crow, and hoot down all those whose views may be opposed to theirs. From long experience of its discussions, we can bear witness that it is tolerant of ambitious dulness and conceited mediocrity even to a fault. The sufferings it will undergo from those who "bestow their tediousness" upon it in over measure are truly wonderful; it is only when its patience is utterly worn out, and its tolerance cruelly abused, that wearied nature overpowers courtesy, and audible expressions of dislike are heard. A dropping fire of "questions" and "obs," is first audible, with intervals. But ignorance and vanity are equally deaf, the hint is not taken; on goes the drone, pouring out common places in "one weak, washy, everlasting flood," perfectly vapid with the absence of thought or fact, or even any novel combination of them. At last some platitude more dismal than its many predecessors, forces a groan from every body at once. To a stranger we admit that the sound is startling enough; but he cannot fully comprehend the infliction that provoked it. Then the storm begins; the whole House throws off its allegiance of attention, to which every speaker has a right. Heads gather into knots of threes and fours; private conversation becomes delightfully unrestrained; through the hum of three hundred voices rises one, that of the portentous bore, happily seen by his gestures to be speaking rather than clearly heard. If he persists beyond this point, things get worse, for pertinacious feebleness becomes offensive and must be put down; it is this putting down that figures in the papers as "a scene," but really it is a wholesome severity and used only as a last resource.

The reverse of this is sometimes seen: a new man rises with some old members; by the custom of the House, he has precedence. There is silence, but not perfect, perhaps; much is not expected. A few sentences fall, and some approving "hears" arrest the indifferent; the House settles itself to listen;—good: the speaker knows his subject; nay, he knows it well: surprising! he is better master of it than the "right hon. gentleman on the Treasury Bench." The silence is now complete; the débutant has got the "ear of the House." He has real knowledge to impart, or he puts former information in a new point of view; he is heard to the end with animated, not merely passive, attention, and concludes amid cheering. He is appreciated forthwith, and with heartiness, too; the men opposed to him are as ready to do justice to his talent as those he joins; and the ready spirit in which this is done is a credit to the House of Commons.

We have sketched a successful first appearance generally; it is of course, modified by individual peculiarities, or mere personal gifts. The effect of extensive information may be lessened by an unhappy mode of imparting it; matter as good as Macaulay's may be spoiled by a style of delivery as disagreeable as Lord G. Bentinck's. But both in matter and manner, the first essay of Mr. Wilson in the House of Commons was highly favourable, and if he keeps to Mr. Cobden's precept, he will deepen the impression. To eloquence he can make no pretension, nor do we think his style adapted to a public assembly; he could hardly sway the passions. But for a select audience, on a special and practical question, that requires an extensive knowledge of facts, with lucid reasoning on, and deductions from them, Mr. Wilson is exactly suited. He speaks as he writes, clearly, and without effort to be fine; he wishes only to be intelligible and to convince. On the subjects to which he has devoted himself, Currency, Banking, and what is called political economy generally, he will be a valuable accession to the House. Indeed, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has already shown that the course the Government has taken on the Railway question is founded on the arguments of the Economist. We cannot here go into an analysis of Mr. Wilson's long speech; but he deserves the thanks of society for, at its very commencement, destroying a fallacy with the repetition of which the public are daily wearied. The Birmingham theorists go about mourning, drinking the water of affliction, and unable to possess their souls in peace, because "the price of gold is fixed, by Act of Parliament, at £3 17s. 10½d. per oz." Walk, at any moment, into any meeting of the Anti-Gold-Law League, and as surely as Sir Robert Peel will ask, in his next speech, "What is a pound?" you will hear the speaker enquiring of the Crown and Anchor audience, "But why should gold, &c. &c. be fixed at £3 17s. 10½d. an oz.?" A grain of common sense would tell them, for no other reason than because an ounce of gold cuts up, or coins, into that quantity, and no more or less, and will do so till the end of the world. We are convinced we are doing public service by re-producing Mr. Wilson's explanation of this difficulty, that is no difficulty at all:—

While many gentlemen admitted the necessity of fixing the standard of value, the necessity of the convertibility of notes into that standard, yet there were many who asked, "Why should we have a fixed price of gold?" That question was now commanding more notice in consequence of the great attention paid to commercial subjects, than, perhaps, any other connected with the currency. If it were attempted by the House to fix the price of gold or any other commodity, he could not conceive anything more absurd. The discussions which had taken place of late years were sufficient to show how futile were the attempts of Parliament either to fix the price of corn or regulate the price of any commercial object; and therefore when gentlemen asked, "Why fix the price of gold at £3 17s. 10½d.?" his answer was that Parliament did not fix the price of gold at all. (Hear, hear.) It simply determined that one ounce of gold should represent three sovereigns, and 17s. 10½d. towards a fourth sovereign. (Hear, hear.) Would any man attempt to fix the price of gold by saying one ounce shall be £3 17s. 10½d.? It might as well be said he could fix the price of a quarter of wheat by saying it shall invariably represent eight bushels.

Mr. Wilson, it need scarcely be said, is a strong advocate of convertibility, and that a paper currency should act precisely as if the circulation was wholly a metallic one. So far, he supports the Act of 1844; but thinks its framers fell into the great error of confounding circulation with capital, and currency with bullion.

Mr. Wilson is of Scotch descent; he is the son of W. Wilson, Esq., of Hawick House, Roxburghshire. He has been engaged in trade in the metropolis, but has for many years been well known as a writer on Political Economy. In 1839, he published his "Influences of the Corn-Laws;" and, at intervals between 1840 and the present year, "Fluctuations of Currency, Commerce, and Manufactures;" "The Revenue; or, What should the Chancellor do?" and "Capital, Currency, and Banking." He attended the recent Free-Trade Congress at Brussels; but, as he addressed it in English, did not produce much effect, especially as his speech was one of abstract principles. He is very fluent; and in this quality lies the only danger he has to apprehend of his speeches being less telling than they might be. They would gain by a more nervous, compact style; in clearness he leaves nothing to be desired. Mr. Wilson must not be confounded with Mr. G. Wilson, the Chairman of the Anti-Corn-Law League.

Mr. Wilson sits for Westbury, in Wiltshire; the place for which Sir Robert Peel sat after he resigned Oxford, on the passing of the Catholic Emancipation Bill.

The accompanying portrait of Mr. Wilson is from a Daguerreotype by Beard.

GEORGE'S FARM FORMERLY "THE SHIP," GRENDON UNDERWOOD, BUCKS.

SHAKSPEREAN RELIC.

Every locality associated with our great Dramatic Poet has a high claim upon popular regard. Hence, the preservation of the natal home of Shakespere, at Stratford-upon-Avon, has excited such interest that on Tuesday next the vast theatre of Covent Garden will be filled to overflowing in tribute to the genius of the Poet.

A locality likely to awaken a kindred enthusiasm has lately been resuscitated, as it were, in the public mind. This is an old roadside house, situated about half-way between London and Stratford-upon-Avon, at Grendon Underwood, Bucks, between Aylesbury and Bicester, but not passed through by the present turnpike road. This house was formerly an inn, with the sign of "The Ship;" and here it is traditionally said that Shakespere used to sojourn on his tedious journey from Stratford to London, and vice versâ.

We annex two picturesque views of this very interesting property, which we learn, from its dilapidated condition, is doomed to be taken down early next spring. These illustrations are from a pair of beautiful sketches in oil by Niemann.

The house has not been for many years used as an inn, and is now attached, as a homestall, to one of the farms the property of Colonel Jarvis, of Shalstone.

The building is oak-framed, or half-timbered, bricked between, and has a gabled front. Its dormer casements have long been removed, and the window frames filled in with plaster; but the gable still contains a singularly lozenge-shaped window. Another exterior change was the removal of a long range of single stalled stabling; a profitable accommodation when the packhorse was the principal means of conveyance across the country.

The interior has an air of greater importance than the exterior; and we learn that within the memory of old parishioners, the Petty Sessions for the Ashendon Hundred of Buckinghamshire were held here. Among the interior decoration is a carved oak staircase, and a mantel-piece, in good condition; the floors are the only portion in actual decay. The chamber in which the Poet is stated to have slept, is pointed out to the visitor; it is the room in the gable with the curious window we have mentioned.

BACK OF GEORGE'S FARM.

There is an old village tradition that Shakespere, while sojourning here, made a study from the village constable, for his play of the "Midsummer Night's Dream." The story would seem to rest upon the authority of "credulous old Aubrey," who, in his brief "life," the earliest connected account of Shakespere, says:—"This William, being inclined naturally to poetry and acting, came to London, I guess, about eighteen, and was an actor at one of the playhouses, and did act exceedingly well. * * * * * * * * He was a handsome, well-shaped, man, very good company, and of a very ready and pleasant smooth wit. The humour of [illegible] the constable, in A Midsummer Night's Dream, he happened to take at Grendon, in Bucks, which is the road from London to Stratford, and there was living that constable about 1642, when I first came to Oxon. Mr. Art. Jenks is of that parish, and will [illegible] Aubrey adds, in a note, "I think it was Midsummer's night that he happened to lie there." Unfortunately, for Aubrey's story, there is no constable in "A Midsummer Night's Dream;" yet, he knew the Poet, for he tells us that "Mr William Shake-pere was wont to go into Warwickshire once a-year, and did commonly in his journey lie at this house in Oxon (The Crown), where he was exceedingly respected."

Mr. Knight, [illegible] ful Biography of Shakspere, quotes the above statement by Aubrey, in a note on the "Life;" but he does not, as related in the Oxford Chronicle, a short time since, assert that Grendon afforded Shakspere character for his village constable, and that his play of the "Midsummer Night's Dream" owes its chief characteristic to the Poet's acquaintance with the locality.

The farmstead at Grendon, however, attracts many visits; and, if it were once the inn wherein the Poet took his ease, it is, indeed, worthy of his homage Thomas Warton remarks—"Shakespere's old hostelry at Oxford deserves no less respect than Chaucer's Tabard, in Southwark;" and, upon the present evidence "The Ship" at Grendon is entitled to like regard.

FOREIGN MUSICAL NEWS.

(From our own Correspondent.)

PARIS, Wednesday.

Verdi's "Jerusalem," in four acts, the poem by MM. Alphonse Royer and Gustave Vaez, was produced last Friday night, at the Theatre de l'Académie Royale de Musique. Its success as a spectacle was immense—as an opera it was a failure. There could be no mistake as to public opinion, even if the critiques in the foyer had been wrong. "Jerusalem" is of the Italian school—without the melody; and of the German style without the science. It has all the mannerisms of Verdi, without his dramatic bursts as in "Nabucco" and "Ernani;" the ensemble is constantly assailed with screaming passages for the voice—there is the constant use and abuse of the unison—there are the reiterated imitations of the crescendo invented by Rossini, and so marvellously turned to account by Meyerbeer—there is obstreperous violence without the intervention of pathetic imagery as a relief. But never was any work more magnificently mounted. The mise en scène was indeed gorgeous, picturesque and varied. It was worthy of the best days of Duponchel, and to this artist, for his taste and liberality, much may be fairly ascribed the dramatic triumph. The adapters of the Italian libretto ("1 Lombardi") have certain *r*mproved upon the original story, by the addition of an exciting scene, the incidents of a mimic tournament, and a touching sympathy. The opera was thus sustained:—Hélène (daughter of the Comte de Toulouse) Mdme. Julian Van Gelder. Isaure, (her maid) Mdme. Muller; the Count, M. Portehaut; Roger, (his brother) Mlard; Gaston Vicomte de Bearn, M. Dupres; the Pope's Legate, M. Bremont; Raymond, (Gaston's Squire) M. Barbot.

The first act passes in Le Palace of the Count of Toulouse. This admirably painted scene, by M. Despléchin, Diéterle, and Desplechin, displays in the background the terrace overlooking the gardens; in the foreground is a gallery which connects the palace with the chapel, the latter being seen through large arches. The plot of the "Lombardi" being known in London, it is only necessary to explain that in this act the Count reconciles a family feud, by giving his daughter to Gaston—that the latter has for rival Roger, the uncle of Helene, a wild man, maddened by his unsuccessful passion. Roger employs an assassin to murder Gaston in the chapel; but, owing to the latter having put on the white mantle of the Count, whom he is about to accompany to Palestine, the father is stabbed instead of his lover. Roger, then, contrives the assassin to accuse Gaston of the attempted murder. The Pope's Legate excommunicates Gaston, and he is banished just after his union with Helene. Three years intervene between the first and second acts, and from Toulouse the scene changes to Palestine, in the mountains of Ramla, the city of that name being seen in the distance. In the foreground being occupied by a cavern. Here Roger, who is penitent for his crime, has turned hermit, and Gaston, who was believed to be dead, unexpectedly meets his wife in the Emir's diun, Helene, who has accompanied her father in the Crusade, he having recovered from his wound. The great procession of the Crusaders, with a band of Sax-horns, takes place in this act, and, with the horses, armour, &c., had a most imposing effect. In the gardens of the seraglio, in the third act, is the divertissement of the "Odalisques," comprising a pas de guerre, danced by Mesdames Maria, Pierre, Robert, and Fleury; a pas de deux, by Mdlle. Plunkett and Mdme. Flora Fabbri; and a pas seul by A. Dumilâtre. Here was a galaxy of choregraphic talent, seen in one night, more than one season will display in London—but heroes is the Académie specialty. In this, the third act, is a scene entirely new, not to be found in the Italian libretto, and a very interesting one it is, dramatically speaking. It is in the public square of Ramla, with a scaffold in the centre of the stage, on which is witnessed the ceremonial of the degradation of a Knight. It is Gaston who goes through this ordeal, the Crusaders having identified him, when they take the Emir's divan by storm. The acting of Duprez defies all description. Rebellious as was his organ, his histrionic and musical genius towered above all physical impediments. As the helmet, shield, banner, &c., of the Knight are broken in pieces by the executioner, and the Herald proclaims him to be a traitor and disloyal cavalier, Gaston exclaims, in piercing accents, which are still haunting me, "Tu mens—tu mens!" Keen, Siddons, Talma, Rouscol, or Macready, never created a more thrilling scene in any of their great tragic parts. [illegible] Duprez in his thus giving the lie on the scaffold, to the charges for which he has been so unaccountably condemned.

In the fourth act, there is Roger's penitence, his giv[illegible] Gaston the attack of the latter on Jerusalem, and triumph—and finally, Roger's confession to the Crusaders of Gaston's innocence.

Verdi has added little to the original score. He has re-written the recitatives. There is an imitation of the rising of the sun by the orchestra; taken, it is said, from his opera of "Attila," but it was not so good as that of David, in the "Desert," nor will the two together ever pass that of Haydn, in the "Creation." The scene of the degradation is, of course, new, but nothing could be more meagreful for Duprez than this dull monotonous music, full of patches, and without a single motif for the ear to dwell upon. Let me now enumerate the pieces which are really effective. The working up of the sextuor, in the first act, is very clever, and was deservedly applauded. In the second act, is the air of the soprano, "Quelle ivresse," an allegro of passion, rendered among by Grisi, and by no means badly rendered by the débutante, Mdlle. Julian Van Gelder, who has a soprano sfogato which is pretty well in tune, and executes decently. But if Miss Birch had sung this part, the opera would have gained amazingly. The Chorus of Pilgrims, with its carrying accompaniment of the piccolo, and its flute trills—although it is a second edition of "Va pensiero," in "Nabucco"—is effective. The Military March was in the last stage of common place. The air for the tenor, so divinely sung by Mario, was lost, owing to the necessity of transposition for Duprez. The ballet is the most tedious thing in the musical telling piece in this opera as the trio in the last act, sung by Mdlame Julian Van Gelder, Duprez, and Mizard. Herein is exhibited Verdi's best in working up the vocal and orchestral parts to a climax—replete with dramatic power.

It is formed you that the Directors of the Académie Royale de Musique threatened an action against Miss Birch. Here is the report of the affair in the Gazette des Tribunaux:—

> A young and charming Englishwoman, Miss Birch, who [illegible] summer was the delight of our neighbours at Covent Garden Theatre in the French reporter is in [illegible] was engaged by Mr. Dupreuil and Roqueplan to sing at the Académie Royale. A duly consumated treaty, between the Directors and the artiste, promised us for this winter, a rival to Jenny Lind and to Alboni. But Englishwomen and Ice are invariable. The Directors have been condemned to pay heavy damages, because she has torn up her contract, and when MM. Duponchel and Roqueplan summoned her to appear at the theatre, she had disappeared—the railroad and steamer had restored her to her country. The Directors then proceeded against the affair as grave, and they have cited Miss Birch before the Tribunal de Commerce, in order to cancel the contract, and to demand 30,000 francs (£1200) damages. M. Duprez, their counsel, emphatically called upon the necessity of a severe example, in order that certain artistes might understand that their engagements were not to be trifled with. The Court gave judgment by default against the young and wandering bird of song, for the 30,000 francs damages.
> Now, to estimate this inquitous persecution of our countrywoman, let it be recollected that on the 25th of October, Miss Birch was given notice that her début was positively to take place on the 29th, in the rehearsal only of "Guillaume Tell" on the 28th; that the day before the rehearsal that opera was changed to the "Favorite;" that Miss Birch rehearsed; and that from the 29th of October [illegible] 17th of Nov. her child did not see a Britain being content with the [illegible] the masters promised in her contract to teach her the French accent; that on that day she received notice her début was fixed for the 2nd, no day long named for a rehearsal. Miss Birch, acting on the sage advice for her friends, very properly left Paris, rather than encounter an ordeal, which she had good reason to believe was intended as a condemnation.

Whether Miss Birch will treat this judgment with silent contempt, or appeal against it, or bring an action for damages against the Directors for their breach of contract (and, I am assured, by a distinguished advocate, that she can certainly sue them for damages), I know not, but, once more, I am appreciative of the conduct of French managers, and not be blinded by the vain supposition that there is anything like an artistical entente cordiale between London and Paris. No! the reciprocity is on one side in England, hospitality and generous patronage of foreign artistes; in Paris, coldness, and ill-treatment, and persecution for our actors and singers.

SHAKESPERE.—The veteran artist, Mimas, has just completed a most elaborate pen and ink drawing of Shakespere's House, at Stratford-upon-Avon, appended to a portrait of our great Dramatic Poet. It is a wonderful achievement in the minute art.

CHLOROFORM.—This new anæsthetic agent was used most successfully last Monday at the Charing-cross Hospital, where it was administered to a young man, whose leg was amputated at the thigh. The operation was performed without a groan, or visible sign of pain. The patient declared after it was over, that he did not experience any pain whatever while under the influence of chloroform. Mr. Hancock and Mr. Avery were the operators.

OUR MAGAZINE COLUMN FOR DECEMBER.

THE MORAL PESTILENCE.

Those who study the physical sciences, and bring them to bear upon the heal of Man, tell us that if the noxious particles that rise from vitiated air were [illegible] to the sight, we should see them lowering in a dense black cloud above [illegible] such haunts, and rolling slowly on to corrupt the better portions of a town. But if the more pestilence that rises with them, and, in the eternal laws of outraged [illegible] ure, is inseparable from them, could be made discernible too, how terrible [illegible] on! Then should we see, in mighty, dunkenness, theft, murder, [illegible] a long train of nameless sins against the natural affections and repulsi[illegible] mankind, overhanging the devoted spots, and creeping on, to blight the innocent and spread contagion among the pure! Then should we see how the same poisoned fountains lost flow into our hospitals and lazar-houses, inundate the ga[illegible] make the convict-ships swim deep, and roll across the seas, and overrun vast continents with crime. Then should we stand appalled to know that, where we generate disease to subtle our children down, and entail itself on unborn generations, there also we breed, by the same certain process, infancy that knows no innocence, youth without modesty or shame, maturity that is manly in nothing but in suffering and guilt, blasted old age that is a scandal on the form we be[illegible] ours. Immunity! When we shall gather grapes from thorns, and figs from thistles; when fields of grain shall spring up from the offal in the by-ways of our wicked cities, and roses bloom in the fat churchyards that they cherish; then we may look for natural humanity, and find it growing from such seed.—Dombey and Son.

WHAT NAPOLEON DID FOR FRANCE.

Let us listen to what the severe voice of history will pronounce [illegible] him: he doth owe the souvereignty of the people. The Emperor of the French Republic, he became a despot—he threw the weight of his sword into the scale of the law—he [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] depopulated the workshops and the fields—he engrafted on the army a new noblesse, which soon became more insupportable than the ancient one, because it had neither the same antiquity nor the same prestige; he levied arbitrary taxes—he decreed that in the whole empire there should be but one voice—his voice; and but one law, her will. The capital, the cities, the armies, the fleets, the palaces, the museums, the magistrates, the citizens, became his capital, his cities, his armies, his fleets, his palaces, his museums, his magistrates, and his subjects. He drew the nation out to conflict and to battle, where we have nothing left remarkable save the opulence of our victories, our corpses, and our gold. In fine, after having besieged the forts of Cadiz—after having in his hands the keys of Lisbon, of Madrid, of Vienna, of Berlin, of Naples, and of Rome—after having made the pavement of Moscow tremble under the wheels of his artillery, he left France less great than he found her—bleeding with her wounds, dismantled of her fortresses, naked, impoverished, and humiliated.—Dublin University Magazine.

HOW TO BLOCKADE PARIS.

To attempt the investment of Paris, encircling a circumference of twent[illegible] leagues, would require a dissemination of force that would render the enemy numerically weaker than the besieged on every point of the circumference. Such a disposition would expose the disaster of the Lines of Turin [illegible] to inevitable ruin and defeat. An enemy would, therefore, establish himself on the northern face of the capital, and throw his cavalry across the river to scour the surrounding country, and cut off the supplies of men and matériel arriving from the interior. Previous to attacking the corps de place, one or two of the detached forts must be carried—an operation that will occupy from fifteen to twenty days. To undertake the regular siege of the entire place, would require an army of 250,000 men, 500 guns, and a large battering train. For the means of transport alone for the matériel de siege, 10,000 waggons and 50,000 horses would be necessary. The consumption of such ammunition in the field as 250 rounds, which, at 8s. rounds per hour, would be expended in twenty-four hours. Everything required for the besieging army, munitions de guerre et de bouche, must be brought up from the rear—an operation, in hostile territory, at all times of immense difficulty, even should all the conditions for securing the line of communicati[illegible] have been rigorously fulfilled. While the enemy is wasting his strength before Paris, the French army, with the recovery of its demoralized departments would have so filled up its cadres, and repaired its losses, that, in less than a month 300,000 men, in the most perfect state of equipment, and in the highest moral condition, would be ready to march against the invade[illegible] Magazine.

THE RAJAH OF SARAWAK AT HOME.

Mr. Brooke usually rises moderately early, overlooks his private rest[illegible] the opposite bank of the river, and where he holds what in India would be denominated his Durbar, receives deputations, hears and determines causes, and [illegible] accessible to all comers. The hall of audience at Sarawak is lofty and spacious, and its appearance when thronged in the morning, is highly characteristic and picturesque in no ordinary degree. Here, each petitioner is conducting a cause of life and death, surrounded by the impetuous natives with their swarthy countenances and flashing eyes, habited in almost theatrical costumes, and armed every one of them with a creese. Every one of these keen weapons is the sentence of death pronounced, which they quietly draw from its sheath, and suffer themselves to be led to the place appointed for their execution. The decision of the sovereign is final in civil and all others who take any interest, they are despatched by a single blow of [illegible] kris; when affairs of less moment are transacting, the natives, separated into groups, chew betel-nut, converse, smoke cheroots, discuss public or private affairs, according to their taste. The assembly breaks up at twelve, and Mr. Brooke, returning to his house, spends several hours in his library, where he keeps up his acquaintance with the literature of Europe, and studies the laws and customs of the various populations of the Archipelago. He then dines with the members of the small European society which his [illegible] around him, and again devotes an hour or two to study. To bed he [illegible] retires, and again devotes an hour or two to study. It should be added, that unless when in his library, he is at all times accessible to anybody, native or stranger; and such is the confidence [illegible] M. says and D[illegible] [illegible] in his house, the doors of which are open from mo[illegible] after this to understand the attachment of the people to their ruler whose character and manners contrast so strikingly with those of the native chiefs.—Bentley's Miscellany.

[illegible] [illegible] [illegible] [

The Clergyman rose up, and making a hasty movement with his hand, he said that he did not want the interference of meddling fanaticism.

"I cannot imagine," said the Sub-Librarian, "how you can ascend the pulpit and preach when you know that there are people who go out of the church perishing of hunger, while you seat yourself at a well-supplied table."

The Clergyman turned himself scornfully round, and said that he knew how to value such demagogical speeches; he was of the old school, and had not the communistic stamp of heresy upon him—he had scarcely a contempt for it. He made a bow, signifying that he wished the departure of his guest, and then added, "Tell your friend that he had better omit his propagandism in sermons, or else there is a police. Adieu."

The Sub-Librarian remained as pale as death to Reinhard, in the public-house. When Lorle enquired from him what had been the result of his errand, he replied, as if angrily, "I am a fool!" and then compressed his quivering lips, and was silent.

Reinhard held his sketch-book open to Lorle, and asked "Who is that?"

"It is Wendelin; let me have it, I will show it to Barbel" said she.

"No, I don't let this book go out of my hand."

"Why?" asked she; "is there anybody drawn in it that I may not see."

"That may be."

Lorle withdrew her hand from the sketch-book.

The two friends took a walk together, during which the Sub-Librarian opened his whole heart. Reinhard also told his adventures.

"You are too much of an artist," remarked the Sub-Librarian, "for you to keep want and misery before your eyes; you seek and retain only what is beautiful."

"And so I always will, until I am commanded by a miracle to cure the diseases of humanity."

"I often cannot conceive," continued the Sub-Librarian, "how I can be cheerful and happy for one single hour, while I know that there are so many miserable human beings at this very moment, entitled equally with myself to the enjoyment of life, who curse and bewail their existence because they suffer in the utmost extreme the want of meat and drink."

The two went on, through the mountain wood, for some time, in silence; on their way they met an old man, who was carrying a bundle of dry wood on his back; the Sub-Librarian stood still, looking after him for some time, and then said, "The human whelk we have in common with the animals is of most use to us. But for this, we must perish in our combat with the world; it is wisely, however, implanted by God in all beings, especially in man. Did you observe how the old man bent forward as he carried his load? He knows nothing about the organisation of his body; nothing about the centre of gravity and equilibrium; and yet he carries his burden perfectly in accordance with the laws of physics. Perhaps, also, mankind are the burden according to natural principles, the laws of which we do not yet understand."

Upon this perhaps, the Sub-Librarian endeavoured to abate the anguish of his soul, but he did not succeed; he could, however, inhale the fresh air, and, with the fresh air, be open to new impressions.

"There is no higher support, no more secure joy, than Nature," said the Sub-Librarian again; "even love itself, I fancy, cannot equal the nameless bliss which we receive from Nature. Thanks be to Nature that she silently and regularly lives on, and only sees us, and converses with us, when our spirits are in a natural state. Only think, if we could drag the whole of nature into the perplexed confusion of our philosophies, theories, and disputes, they would also interrupt her secretary of conference upon her in our ideas, how would it be, we should become! There may be a deep meaning in what is told us in the Bible of God creating the world by the word, but without an outwardly expressed will. When he formed man, however, He spoke: "Let us make man in our image." Nature neither speaks nor wills; but we both speak and will; we, therefore, set ourselves in a state of opposition and combat."

They returned home in cheerful spirits.

One following forenoon the Sub-Librarian was obliged to return to the city to the duties of his office.

He arose very early in the morning and perfectly tuned the piano, Reinhard entered the room and his friend said to him with a pensive smile,

"Everything becomes symbolical to me. I have now tuned the piano, but shall not to-morrow play a merry dance upon it. Apres vous la danse. The dance begins after we are gone. These stones and a few butterflies, they are all that I take with me from this village."

Of all the people of the house Lorle alone was the one who took a heartfelt leave of him. When he was gone, she said to Reinhard, "I cannot think how it is, but the cook at the parsonage has spread it abroad in the village that Mr. Sub-Librarian is a Godless heathen; she says he has been to the clergyman and abused him about his sermon, and has sworn at the new church. But he really cannot be a bad man, what do you think?" He has such a very good heart."

Reinhard looked gratefully at Lorle. The separation from his friend also touched his heart, and yet he fancied that he now, for the first time, should feel really cheerful and free; that he should cast of all disturbing thought now that his friend had left him." * * *

A few days after this a new entry was made in one of the private books of the capital; a new criminal account was opened, and the entry which was made was thus: "To the Secretary of the Board of Public Worship—The Sub-Librarian, Adalbert Reihenmaier, at the complaint of the Rev. Mr. M., Rector of Wossenach, as reported by the Court in G——, is accused of holding atheistical opinions, and of attempting to excite the people." Reg. VII. 3. sect. Lett. 14263.

NATIONAL SPORTS.

THE sporting feature just now is steeple chasing. The taste for this amusement—it cannot be classed as a sport—received its chief encouragement as regards its present characteristics in the establishment of the "Great National Steeple Chase" at Liverpool, some eight or nine years ago. The practice of running matches "across country" was known at this island a very long time back. It has reached in the side of the "Wild Goose Chase" and one would not be justified in asserting that the term might not be preserved in our own day. Railways, of late years, have seriously damaged fox-hunting to say nothing of their effects upon other pursuits. This, no doubt, has considerably increased the popularity of that new contrivance in rural recreation, but the existing passion for betting of any kind in relation to equestrian contests, has also promoted the taste in no small degree. It might not be out of our province to inquire whether other passages in class legislation of recent date—have not had something to do with the epidemic in speculation now raging among all classes. Was it convenient—was it just to shut up the shops of the roulette professors to break up the tables of the thimble and pea fraternity, and to connive at their success, the Sweep and Lottery factors? This question might be put, and perhaps not so satisfactorily answered; but we waive it—at least for the present—and revert to the sport of steeple chasing. We do this for no purpose of "snubbing it"—although not one of our especial proteges. We do it—because we touch at such subjects in these seasons to find best of a poor sketch. But we do not profess to treat this particular branch in detail. Few subjects, probably, offer more difficulties to the historian punctilious in accuracy. The spectator is seldom desirous of more than a glimpse or two of the style of the sport devoted to operations. Well, he inquires how such and-such a brook was got over, of the Hon. Captain Loosefish, who rode in the race. "Can't say," replies the Captain, "for I was at the rear—full at the time." "My dear Bulefinch," he demanded, "how about that rasper the hundred and fiftieth from home—how many cleared it?" "I'm sure I can't tell you," he rejoins, with perfect bonhommie, "for I was down; but ask my horse, who saw it all, for he was on the top of me." Circumstances such as these may hold as excused if we do not enter into the ups and downs of these encounters of chivalry.

During the current week there were some odd sporting mistakes, which made some scandal in their especial circles. In one quarter it was stated that a batch of the ultra aristocracy had been simultaneously done for; and that one of those unfortunates was so be turned out to starve upon £600 a year. The report was generally contradicted, to the honour of the age we live in. Should the future annals of Great Britain record that a nobleman, in 1847, kept soul and body together on thirty shillings a day? . . . Fortid it decency and delicacy to ask Punch's Pages! Apropos of turkey and truffles—there was another mistake in this latter respect. It had been rumoured that Mr. Brooke, "of Sarawak," would dine, on Thursday last, with Royal Thames Yacht Club men from far and near, to present a testimonial to the metropolis to do honour to their brother—from Borneo. But somehow or other his Excellency had also an engagement at Norwich, and couldn't conveniently keep both. So the club dined by itself, and a report got about that the pressure the circumstances. The first Thursday in the month is the regular club meeting of that most popular society. On the occasion referred to, several new members, Lords and Squires of degree, were balloted for, and enrolled as accepted brethren . . . . One word on the state of the market at Tattersall's the prices are given below. The Derby horses quote a fresh rise that should be tenderly felt science, as well as cautious. The prestige of their stables will, indeed, soon advance several of the favourites independent of their sporting race—with the animals in the betting, such as it is, are not there on their Epsom merits. Surplice is not a Derby horse. If well on the day, we should be sorry to stand on him at the present price. For the Derby of 1848 every animal should be greedily laid against that rescues 10 to 1—but pick and choose your customers.

IRELAND.

INDISPOSITION OF THE CHANCELLOR. The Irish Chancellor continues to labour under rather severe indisposition. His Lordship sat during the past week disposing of the cases in his Court, although visibly suffering from the effects of influenza. It is understood that Sir Henry Marsh has recommended his Lordship to abstain for the present from the discharge of his public duties in Court, and that in consequence he will not sit this week.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER, DUBLIN.—On Saturday last judgment was given in the long-pending cases of Smith v. Darley, for the City Treasurership, which has been twelve years in litigation. By a majority of seven to four of the Judges, the decision is in favour of Mr. Darley, who is now treasurer of the city of Dublin.

DURING the past week Lord Wadsworth called together the tenants on his estates in the county of Galway, and, through his agent, Mr. Skilling, announced to them his full determination of establishing on his properties "tenant right," as it exists on the estates of Lord Londonderry, Mr. Sharman Crawford, and others in the north, viz.:—First, Securing to every tenant the permanent interest and occupation in his holding for so long as he pays a fair and equitable rent.

Secondly, Securing to the tenant at any time the right to sell his holding, with the improvements he has made, to the highest bidder, the purchaser being a solvent tenant and a proper character.—Thirdly, That, should Lord Wadsworth, at any future time, wish to resume the land held by any tenant, or the tenant wish to surrender it, his Lordship will give full remuneration for it—the same price as any other solvent purchaser would give, so that no tenant shall be deprived of his holding on these estates without being fairly remunerated for his interest, his skill, and labour.—Mr. Skilling also announced that money would be advanced to any tenant unable to supply himself with manure and seed for his land in the ensuing season. These announcements were received by the people with the greatest satisfaction and enthusiasm.

HOLYHEAD PACKETS NEW SAILING ORDERS. Her Majesty's mail packets for Kingstown are ordered to sail henceforth daily, at half-past four, P.M., instead of twelve minutes past six. The same packets are henceforth ordered to leave Kingstown in the morning at eight o'clock, instead of nine o'clock.

REPEAL ASSOCIATION.—The Repeal Association met on Monday, but the proceedings were entirely destitute of interest. An address to the people of Ireland on "the horrible crimes which are being committed in some parts of the country," was adopted and ordered to be circulated. A letter from Mr. J. O'Connell, M.P., was also read. The rent for the week was £76.

SHIPWRECK AT THE GIANT'S CAUSEWAY. On the night of Monday se'nnight, the schooner Spokesman, Bell, master, from Liverpool to Derry, laden with canned coal, came on shore at Ferencher, a total wreck. The foremast, anchors, and chains were gone, and great part of the bottom knocked out. The log-book and papers were found, but no entry had been made from the previous Thursday. The fate of the crew has not been ascertained, but it is feared all hands may have been lost.

ASSASSINATION.—A letter, dated Elphin, Sunday evening, announces that the Rev. Mr. Lloyd, of Smithbrook, was shot dead at noonday on his way home from Aughrim Church.

NAVAL AND MILITARY INTELLIGENCE.

SUDDEN DEATH OF THE ADMIRAL SUPERINTENDENT OF PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD.—Rear-Admiral of the Blue William Henry Shortt, the lately-appointed Superintendent of Portsmouth Dockyard, died at his residence in the arsenal, on Wednesday morning. The gallant Admiral had only been ill a few days, it is said, from constipation of the bowels, to which he was subject. He was seized with cramps and spasms between eleven and twelve on Tuesday night, and, soon becoming insensible, died in two hours afterwards. The commissions of the deceased are dated thus:—Lieutenant, 1804; Commander, 1806; Captain, 1809; Rear-Admiral, 1846 (the late Brevet).

The Victory, 104, late ordinary guard-ship at Portsmouth for many years past, was paid off on Thursday, and re-commissioned on the following day by Commander Graham Ogle, for Captain Milne, as the permanent flag-ship of the Commander-in-Chief at that port. Her future complement will only be 161 men. First Lieutenant Jones, Second Lieutenant Croker, 2 sergeants, 3 corporals, 1 drummer, and 43 privates of this division of Royal Marines are draughted for her, and will embark to-morrow. The officers and men of the ordinary will be hulked in the Camperdown, 104, until another permanent ordinary guard-ship is established.

IT is reported to be in contemplation to remove about 200 of the marines from the head-quarters of this division on board the Camperdown, to relieve the inhabitants of Portsmouth from the annoyance of billeting—a system which at present the marine authorities here are compelled to have recourse to on account of the number (about 1100) of men at present in the garrison, and the inadequacy of their barracks to contain them.

ACCIDENTS AND OFFENCES.

AWFULLY SUDDEN DEATH.—An awful instance of the instability and insecurity of human life was exemplified on Saturday morning, in the case of John Campbell, a sugar baker, residing at No. 2, Marlborough street, Whitechapel, who for many years was in the employ of Messrs. Finlaey, Brothers, extensive sugar refiners, in Church-lane, Whitechapel. In the course of the morning he complained of a pain in his head, and lay down on the bed, where, only a quarter of an hour afterwards, he was discovered by his descendants a lifeless corpse.

GUNPOWDER ACCIDENT. On Sunday, a fearful explosion of gunpowder, by which two persons were severely injured, occurred at No. 124, High-street, Borough, in the occupation of Mr. Harris, a baker. While Mr. Harris was engaged in the first floor front amusing his children, by discharging small trains of gunpowder on the table, the contents of the powder in a flask which he was holding suddenly exploded, dreadfully injuring one child in the face, blowing off the head of Mr. Harris's right hand, and forcing the windows of the room out. Several persons who were passing by at the time, imagining that the house was on fire, sent for the engines, and Mr. Henderson, the foreman of the D division of the London Establishment, quickly attended with two; when he found Mr. Harris bleeding copiously, and the flesh from his hand adhering to the ceiling. He was about to be removed to the hospital, when he at present remains in a dreadful state of suffering. The child was also so injured as to be obliged to have the right eye extirpated. The house sustained destruction.

FIRE AT MR. BLACKWALL.—On Monday morning, about two o'clock, Inspector Ireland, of the Thames Police, discovered flames issuing from the extensive premises belonging to Messrs. Miller, Ravenhill, and Co., ship-builders and engineers, Orchard wharf, Blackwall. The Inspector and his men, on getting to the premises, found the blacksmiths' workshop in a general body of fire. The building in which the fire commenced was levelled to the ground, and an adjoining one severely injured. That, however, constituted the entire damage sustained. The fire was occasioned from some hot cinders, which ignited the woodwork of the smithy.

THE MATRICIDE AT HACKNEY. William Stewart Sheridan was on Monday fully committed for trial for the murder of his mother, Mrs. Frances Sheridan, by poison. He is not connected with the family of the celebrated Brinsley Sheridan, as stated by the Coroner at the inquest.

OMNIBUS COLLISION.—On Monday afternoon, as one of the twopenny yellow omnibuses, from Hungerford-Market to Paddington, was passing Waterloo-house, Cockspur-street, it was run against by another omnibus, on its way to the Great Western Railway terminus, and, by the collision, the roof of the first vehicle fell in, and all the windows were smashed, and the sides forced out. The passengers were extricated as soon as possible, and two men, a boy, and a woman were taken much hurt, to the Charing-cross Hospital; and a lady named Bristow, on whose head an outside male passenger fell, was carried away insensible.

FIRES AT DEPTFORD.—Two fires broke out on Wednesday, in Wood-street, Cheapside; one at a quarter before five o'clock in the evening, at No. 105, in the occupation of Mr. E. Eagles, fancy box-maker. It was caused by a child letting a lighted candle fall amongst a quantity of cut paper, which in a few minutes set the top floor in a general blaze. Some engines shortly arrived, and, plenty of water being obtained, the firemen soon succeeded in getting the flames out, but not until the top floor was burned out, and the lower part damaged by water. The other fire broke out shortly before 1 A.M., at No. 68, occupied by Mr. J. Loughlin, a dealer. It was occasioned by a spark flying from a lighted candle amongst some shavings in the first floor, where the trade is carried on. The fire was confined to the contents of the room, which were burned out, and the stock in the warehouse below damaged by water.

SUICIDE IN THE SURREY ZOOLOGICAL GARDENS.—On Wednesday Mr. W. Carter held an inquest at the Royal George, Newington, on the body of Ann Smith, aged 24, who committed suicide in the Royal Surrey Zoological Gardens. Matthews, the menagerie-taker at the Gardens, proved having been called to the deceased, who was lying on her face near the giraffe-house. He sent for a surgeon, Mr. Iliff, jun., surgeon, and that the deceased had died from the effects of essential oil of almonds. An assistant to Mr. Thomas, surgeon, said that the deceased purchased fourpence worth of essential oil of almonds on Wednesday, which she said she wanted for flavouring custards. The Coroner spoke in strong terms upon the impropriety of selling such deadly poisons, and he hoped that something would soon be done by the Legislature to put a stop to it. Verdict, "That the deceased destroyed herself while labouring under mental aberration."

TEMPLE-BAR ON FIRE. On Sunday morning, about one o'clock, an alarm was given that Temple bar was on fire. In a few minutes two steamers of the Royal Society for the Protection of Life from Fire, with five brigade engines, were in attendance, when it was found that the outbreak had occurred in the hair-dresser's shop, belonging to Mr. Tanner, adjoining the foot-passage at the northern side of the bar, and, from the strong hold the flames had obtained, there is little doubt that a fearful conflagration would have taken place had the fire not been so opportunely discovered. Mr. Tanner's loss is inconsiderable.

ROMAN CATHOLIC RELIEF BILL.—Mr. Anstey's measure for the further repeal of enactments imposing pains and penalties upon her Majesty's Roman Catholic subjects on account of their religion, which was brought in and read a first time on Thursday week, is now printed. The preamble recites the Acts passed in the present reign towards further relief, and also the 10th George IV., cap. 7, which declares that it is inexpedient to repeal any of the statutes ordained by the Parliament of England, the Parliament of Great Britain, and the Parliament of Great Britain and Ireland respectively still continue. The first clause details all the Acts from the 1st of Elizabeth, cap. 1, to the 10th George IV., cap. 7, which it is further necessary to repeal, and the second clause declares that nothing in the Act shall legalise the celebration of rites of worship of the Catholic Church in public thoroughfares, or in anywise vary or affect the laws now in force touching the holding of processions, congregations, or assemblies.

WALKING DRESSES, NO. 2.

STRATA FLORIDA ABBEY.

At the late meeting of the Cambrian Archæological Association, held at Aberystwith, one of the intellectual delights of the company was an excursion to the remains of Strata Florida Abbey, which afforded much to interest; and the Dean of Hereford, after giving an account of the visit at the evening meeting, observed, that

If the only result of the society's visit to South Wales was the careful exploration of this beautiful ruin, their time would not have been thrown away; and if each present extended his inquiries only to his own immediate neighbourhood, he would be doing a vast amount of good."

It is proposed to raise a subscription to clear out the remains of a ruin which possesses a history of greater interest than any other ecclesiastical structure in the country; and, we can only add our anxious hope for the success of this interesting work.

The Abbey stood in a small Vale, luxuriant by comparison with the adjoining country.

We find the following neat description of the locality, and its attractions, in Mr. Cliffe's excellent "Book of South Wales," lately published —

"In this deep and austere solitude, well calculated for religious meditation, and discipline of body and mind, a stately Abbey and seminary of learning were founded A.D. 1164, by Rhys, son of Griffith ap Rhys, Prince of South Wales. The community, who were Cisterciens, soon attained great celebrity, and acquired extensive possessions. A large library was formed, which included the national records from the earliest period, the works of the Bards, and the genealogies of the Princes and other great families of Wales. The Monks compiled a valuable history of their country down to the death of Llewellyn the Great. Edward I. burned the Abbey, but it was rebuilt A.D. 1294, and Leland furnishes the following picture of its appearance a short period before the Dissolution of Monasteries, when the revenues were £142 6s. 8d. 'The Church of Strate-fere is large side-aisled and cross-aisled. By it is a large Cloyster, the Fratry and Infirmanry be now mere ruins. The Cemetery, wherein the country about doth bury, is very large, and meanly walled with stone; and in it be thirty-nine yew trees. The base Court or Camp before the Abbey is very fair and large.' Old Leland then speaks of the remains of extensive woods in the vicinity. It is said that the burying-place covered 120 acres, and a long list of eminent persons from all parts of Wales who were interred here, including Davydd ap Gwilim, the celebrated bard, has been preserved. The churchyard is now reduced to small dimensions, but leaden coffins have often been dug up at a distance; and only a few yew and some aged box trees now remain. The Abbey has been almost wholly demolished, little being left except a late Romanesque arch, with six plain fustiags and a crosier head. There is also a fragment of a wall, nearly forty feet high. A small Church, which has been constructed out of the ruins, stands within the Abbey enclosure, surrounded by a churchyard of two acres; a farm-house is near at hand."

THE THEATRES.

PRINCESS'.

A crowded house assembled on Thursday evening to greet Madame Thillon, on her return to this theatre, when the agreeable opera of "The Ambassadress" was produced; or, rather, Madame Thillon sang charmingly the music belonging to her rôle in that piece, for nothing could be more lamentably ineffective than the performance, taken as a whole. The fair songstress herself is always welcome. Her beauty, her musical voice, and her graceful acting, are sure to command a full attendance and liberal applause: but it is an unjust towards her as it is to the public who pay their money to witness the performance of an opera, not to support her in a proper manner. We fear that the prospects of this once favourite theatre are anything but bright. It has fallen into a bad medium between drama and opera, since the management adopted the "star" system: and so, with two attempted companies, is, in each, imperfect. Mr. Macready's engagement has been anything but prosperous. At its commencement the plays in which he appeared were so shabbily mounted, that the public lost faith in the revivals; and when some money was spent upon Philip Van Artevelde, the excitement was over. Even this piece, with its splendid mise en scene, only went six or seven nights. As to attempting opera with the present company, the notion is absurd; nor are the vaudeville actresses of this theatre, clever as they may be, strong enough to sustain even the second parts. This is not their fault. Miss Stanley and Miss Villars are excellent in their proper line, but it is unfair thus to tax them.

To return, however, to Madame Thillon. She was enthusiastically received, and loudly applauded throughout, especially in the last song, when she obtained a double encore.

We have engraved one of the most effective tableaux in the poetic drama of "Philip van Artevelde." The plot and leading incidents of the piece were detailed, at some length, in our journal of last week. The scene chosen by our artist is that in which Philip addresses the craftsmen of Ghent, from the balcony of the Stadt House, previously to the assassination of the emissaries of the Earl of Flanders.

LYCEUM.

Miss Kathleen Fitzwilliam, the eldest daughter of the popular actress of the same name, made her first appearance before a London audience on Wednesday evening, in a piece called "Peggy Green," of which the less that is said the better. It was evidently intended merely as the vehicle to bring the young lady before the public; and, now that we have become acquainted with her, the sooner it is put by the better. The heroine, a milliner, tired of London, and angry with her lover, retires to a farm house. Her lover follows her; she pretends to be somebody else, to punish him; and—this is all. We will, therefore, turn our attentions more especially to the debutante.

Miss Fitzwilliam is young, pretty, and intelligent. Her figure is rather petite, and her voice, at times, strongly resembles her mother's, more especially in her rustic laugh, which rings with heartiness and freshness. She appears perfectly accustomed to the stage; and delivers all her points, at least so many as the piece allow s her to make, with much natural and unstudied humour. In the course of the performance she had three ballads to sing, and this she did so musically, that the very first was loudly encored; and the two others warmly applauded, in good honest style. A word or two of French that she had to deliver, showed that her pronunciation was perfect; indeed, altogether, we can safely prophecy that a very great deal will be heard and seen of her for a long time to come, at the Lyceum.

We seldom recollect a first appearance in which the new performer was so speedily and completely established in the good graces of the audience, as the present; and this, looking to the piece, under the most disadvantageous circumstances. In the present dearth of talent in the line of theatrical soubrettes, Miss Fitzwilliam is a valuable acquisition to the company. The only wonder is, that she has been allowed to remain, even to the present time, in the provinces by the London managers, when we have so few young and prepossessing actresses qualified to take the business of what is facetiously termed, in theatrical classification, the "singing chambermaid."

The crowded audience applauded most vigorously at the fall of the curtain, and the debutante appeared before it amidst renewed cheering. In justice, however, to the young lady, a better part should be provided for her; and that speedily.

SADLER'S WELLS.

Mr. Phelps proceeds with his Shakesperian revivals, and "As You Like It" is the last production at this theatre. It evinces all the same careful judgment and intelligence, beyond the ordinary managerial allotment, which characterises everything done at Sadler's Wells. The costumes are good, the scenery very effective, and the performance generally equal to anything that has preceded it. Indeed, the critics begin to find it somewhat difficult to form fresh methods of praising the general manner in which this theatre is conducted. We were glad to see Miss Cooper again. She played Rosalind with exceeding propriety. Mr. Phelps was, of course, Jacques; Mr. Marston, Orlando; and Mr. Scharf and Mrs. Marston, Touchstone and Audrey.

MARYLEBONE.

Looking over our theatrical chronicles we find that it is just a century since Beaumont and Fletcher's play of "The Scornful Lady" was last performed; and it was then played at Drury Lane, after a lapse of ten years, for the benefit of the popular and beautiful Margaret Woffington—the "Peg Woffington" of the dramatic annals. On this occasion Foote played the Younger Loveless, Macklin Sir Roger, and Mrs. Woffington the Lady. We then hear no more of the piece until the year 1783, at Covent Garden, when an alteration from it was brought out, and called "The Capricious Lady," Mrs. Abington sustaining the part of the heroine. This only ran seven nights.

On Monday evening another version was produced, with its original name, at the Marylebone Theatre: the gross indecency and filth of the original "standard" play having been entirely excised, and the adaptation of its questionable incidents to modern notions of propriety, admirably managed by Mr. Serle. Whether, as a play, resting rather upon portrayal of character than progress of action, "The Scornful Lady" will prove attractive to the settlers in the districts about Paddington remains to be proved. At all events, the experiment was a very spirited one; and no praise is sufficient for the admirable manner in which it has been put upon the stage. It was thus cast:—Elder Loveless, Mr Graham; Younson Loveless, Mr. Belton; Welford, Mr. G Vining; Sir Roger, Mr. H. Wallack; the Captain, Mr. Johnston; Lady, Mrs. Warner; Abigail, Miss Saunders. To Mr. Graham and Mrs. Warner must be awarded the chief commendation—not that the other ladies and gentlemen did not equally do their best, but the principal business of the piece lies in their hands. The lady's scorn and piqued selfconceit were admirably developed—the character in every respect suiting Mrs. Warner's style; and Mr. Graham played the gallant with much truthful ease, and to make us regret that we do not see him more frequently in similar characters. Mr. H. Webb was exceedingly humorous as the Curate: he has only to renounce the lowest portions of his comedy, to become a very valuable legitimate performer. It is the absence of all trickery that renders the acting of Mr. Scharfe so agreeable at Sadler's Wells."

We have spoken in general terms of the beautiful manner in which the piece was mounted. The costumes of the time were perfect pictures; and the old interiors of the scenery contrived with an admirable eye to the picturesque. The apartment of the Lady was by far the best "set" of the kind that we have gone for some time. As an "interior," it might rank with those in Nash's mansions. The inlaid floor, and wainscoted walls—the old spiral legs of the tables and chairs, —the square, scanty carpets and ancient china—were all perfect. Wardour-street would have been puzzled to match its str of antiquity; and it was alone worth the visit to Marylebone to see.

Mrs. Warner was called for at the end of the play; and she deserved the compliment.

The influenza has operated somewhat against the interests of the theatres; and its effects have been felt both before and behind the curtains. For the time of year, however, the general business is very good; and this in the face of four or five passive failures—if we may term them so—of pieces upon which great expectations had been raised.

DRURY-LANE is announced to open on Monday; and, in every corner of that vast establishment, workmen are night and day incessantly employed. Mr. Jullien has put forth a monster programme, to which we refer our readers for the detail of his intentions. Sir Henry Bishop is at the head of the musical department, and Mr. Bertine will conduct; Mr. Maddox will superintend the stage affairs; Mr. Forrester (Alfred Crowquill) is the stage manager; and Messrs. Grieve and Telbin the scenic artists. Two operas, a ballet, and a pantomime are to be brought out before the end of January—"putting the steam on" with a vengeance, and will require the most active co-operation of all parties to bring to a successful issue.

All London will, we expect, be at COVENT GARDEN on Tuesday evening, on the occasion of the performance for the benefit of the Shakespere house fund. So remarkable an opportunity of witnessing all the principal dramatic talent of the day, in one evening, will not occur for a long time.

Mr Mitchell's elegant programme of the arrangements for the ensuing season of French plays at the ST JAMES'S THEATRE, has reached us—the first intimation, as usual, that the fashionable heart of London is more commencing to throb, after its autumnal suspended animation. Several old favourites will appear, including M. M Achard, Lewasseur, Alcide, Tousez, Ravel, and Cartigny; and, in addition to these, M. Bocage, M. Grassot, and the lively Mademoiselle Servanneck, of the Palais Royal, with several other popular artistes. "Antigone, with Mendelssohn's music, will be produced in January, directed by M. Benedict, M. Bocage filling the chief rôle; and the general repertoire includes all the latest novelties of the Parisian theatre.

MONETARY TRANSACTIONS OF THE WEEK.

(From our City Correspondent.)

At the weekly meeting of the Directors of the Bank of England, on Thursday, it was decided that the interest on loans not having more than sixty days to run, should be reduced to 5 per cent. This, in addition to the present position of the Money Market, must speedily lead to the revival of trade. The difficulty, a few weeks since, was to meet the demand for Money: now, discount brokers and bankers find a difficulty in safely employing it. Good trade bills are not obtainable in consequence of the past stagnation, and Exchequer bills have recently been tendered by discount brokers as securities for loans advanced, the interest on the same. Such a state of money must speedily open the channels of trade; in fact suspended orders are already being commenced. As money decreases in the street, it will become more generally felt, and the operatives in the manufacturing districts will find increased employment. This will, also, favorably affect the revenue, which, if better than anticipated, we add still more in confidence. And confidence remain unchecked then for a few weeks only, and the reaction will be as rapid as the past has been disastrous.

The stoppage of the merchants of Messrs. Thurburn and Co, East India Merchants, who failed on the 8th instant, was held on Monday. The house is under acceptances for £252,807, but of this amount £131,983 is covered, leaving a total uncovered of £120,819. The gross deficiency is upwards of £90,000, arising from bad debts, as the largest claims are on the Calcutta firm of Hickey and Co., what extent may be realised is very doubtful. The estate will be liquidated under the inspectorship of Mr. Alexander Mullens, Mr. Hodgson, and Mr. Thomas Thurburn.

The estate of Messrs. Rougement, Brothers, it is confidently stated, will realise 14s in the pound, of which 10s. may be made available in the course of three months. Farther advances to such a great extent have been recommended for the firm to go into the Gazette for the protection of their general creditors, and it is said that their accounts are perfectly satisfactory

The settlement of the estate of Messrs. A and J. Downie, of Glasgow is likely to prove very unfavorable, yielding, probably, not more than 2s. to 3s in the pound. The amount is supposed to be £200,000, a great portion of which being local, the effect will be severely felt.

From Liverpool we learn the suspension of Messrs. Jushua Edwards and Co., wool-brokers, and of Messrs. Brownrigg, Miller, and Co., an East India house, whose trade was carried on exclusively with Bombay. The liabilities and assets are not in either case stated.

A meeting of the Proprietors of the Royal Bank of Liverpool was held on Tuesday, preparatory to the re-opening of the establishment on Wednesday, when the new deed of settlement was submitted for consideration, and approved. In order to increase the constituency, the £1000 shares are to be converted into five shares of £200 each, and £400,000 new capital to be created, in addition to £600 000 preference shares of £100 each, to be paid up on the 10th of January next, the liability on whom is to commence on the 1st of January. These shares are to bear 7 per cent. interest, and as soon as dividends equal to 7 per cent. from the date of the re-opening of the bank shall have been paid also to the original shareholders, the preference shareholders are to divide surplus profits beyond that sum. Meanwhile, only 5 per cent. is to be paid to original shareholders until a reserved fund shall have been created to the amount of £160 000. It is also provided that the paid-up capital only, and not the deposits or other funds, shall be employed in advances on open account; that no advance be made beyond £50,000 without security, and that the highest advance on any security whatever be £50,000; that shares of the Bank be not taken as security; that Directors have no votes on advances to parties connected with them either by relationship or business, and that paid Directors and Manager have no advances whatever. Two paid Directors are to be appointed, with £1000 per annum each, and Mr. Jeffcock, who has consented to a reduction of salary, is to continue Manager. The paid Directors and Manager are to constitute a permanent committee, two being a quorum, to determine upon advances or the opening of accounts, and no advances are to be made without the assent of any one of them. It was further arranged that proprietors subscribing to the new preference shares shall be freed from liability to pay the call recently announced, and that as regards those who may agree to subscribe the whole proportion for such new shares, a sale of the shares may be effected in the market, the proprietor being relieved thereby from the payment of the call upon his making up any loss which may be occasioned, he, on the other hand, being the party that is entitled to be disposed of at a premium. An election of Directors then took place, and the parties chosen were Messrs. Highfield, Booker, Tyrer, Shand, Stock, Ilsley, Samuel Holme, and Earle. It was stated during the meeting that "satisfactory arrangements have been entered into with the London Joint-Stock Bank." On Wednesday payment commenced in London, the Joint-Stock Bank becoming the drafts of the Liverpool Bank, as it understood, has been settled by account of their present town agents.

A list of bankruptcy has been issued against Messrs. Barton, Irlam, and Higginson.

The English Funds opened steadily on Monday, Consols for Money quoting 84¾ to 85. Some large bargains for Time, arising from a bullet in an early arrangement of the Swiss question, shortly improved the quotations to 85¼ to ⅜, at which price was, however, barely sustained to the close; and, on Tuesday, 85 to ⅜ was the highest. Scarcely a fluctuation occurred during the day; but, on Wednesday morning, the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech—his anticipations of the "speedy revival of trade," and the announcement of the Bank's reduction to 5 per cent, combined to improve prices 5 per cent. The first price was 85¾ for Money; a feeling that the Bank would reduce the rate of discount afterwards improved quotations to 85⅞ to ⅞. This anticipation occurred on Thursday, and a rapid rise to 86¼ was the result. A slight reaction, however, left prices a shade lower. Exchequer Bills have been from at par. These securities are growing in favour, forming now, in the absence of commercial paper, the best investment for advances. Bank and India Stocks have not materially varied, and the last prices are, for Bank Stock, 187; Three per Cent. Reduced, 84¾; Three per Cent. A decided improvement has taken place in the railway market, in the dividend paying lines most especially. Orders are generally for purchase, and the public are quietly making small investments. SATURDAY MORNING.—There was a general tendency to flatness yesterday, arising, however, principally from absence of business. Consols scarcely varied, closing at 85¾ to ⅞ for Money, and 86¼ to ⅜ for Account. The Share and Foreign Market was quiet, at previous rates.

THE MARKETS.

CORN EXCHANGE (Friday).—Although we have again to report the arrival of a very limited supply of English wheat for our market for the week, the country has not manifested the demand for that article to-day was in a very sluggish state, at barely, but at nothing quotable beneath Monday's prices. At the close of the week's business a clearance was not effected, the imports of foreign wheat have amounted to 4000 quarters. Selected parcels were held at full prices, but, in other parts of the building and inferior kinds, lower rates must have been submitted to. In barley the supply of wheat was small—to little was doing that the quotations were almost nominal. The demand for malt was much in the same state. Some few [illegible] were made, but at very low prices, even for good qualities The milling and inferior [illegible] were almost unsaleable Oats, beans, and peas were heavy, and the turn lower. Sheep were in the market 270 town and cows, 340 sheep and 114 calves from Holland and Germany. With about a fair average supply supplied; nevertheless, the inquiry for that description of stock was in a sluggish state, at many of Monday's quotations. INTERIOR OF THE NEW GREAT CIRCULAR ENGINE-HOUSE, AT THE CAMDEN-TOWN DEPOT OF THE NORTH WESTERN RAILWAY.

GREAT CIRCULAR ENGINE-HOUSE, NORTH-WESTERN RAILWAY.

At the north-east corner of the Camden Town Depôt of the North-Western Railway, by the Hampstead-road, has lately been erected this vast accommodation for the engines and tenders used in the luggage department of the line.

The building presents some striking peculiarities of construction, which our Artist has represented in his Illustration, and which we find thus detailed in our active contemporary, the Builder :

"The building is of circular form, 160 feet in diameter in the clear of walls. The roof is supported on twenty-four columns at equal distances, and forms a circle 40 feet in diameter from the centre of the building. The columns are 21 feet 9 inches high. On the top of these columns are twenty-four cast-iron girders, running in a right line between each column, and connected at each column with bolts. These girders are formed into an arch, being 2 feet 9 inches deep; the top flange is moulded, and the spandrils perforated, directly over the columns; and connected with them are an equal number of standards, 30 feet 3 inches in height, from the top of girders; at the top they are flanged each way, to receive the purlins and principal rafters, twenty-four of which run up to the lantern-light, and twelve finish on the purlins, at the top of standards. The lantern-light stands 4 feet 3 inches from the roof, and is formed at the same inclination with the roof, with wood louvres at the sides, and cast-iron sash-bars at the top, and covered with rough plate glass; at the top is a piece of cast iron, 2 feet 6 inches in diameter, into which the tops of the sash-bars are fastened; at the apex is a large wooden ball, covered with 10lbs. lead. The height from the line of rails to the tension-rod is 25 feet. The principal rafters drop on a cast-iron shoe, resting on stone templates. The tension-rods pass through the shoes and standards, and are secured with nut and screws. The top part of the principals and lantern-light are supported by cast-iron brackets, springing from the bottom of standards, and secured to the principals within 9 feet of the curb of lantern. From the line of rails to the top of the ball is 69 feet 6 inches. From the line of rails to the top of concrete is 21 feet 6 inches, with a bed of concrete 2 feet 6 inches deep, making a total height from the bottom of concrete to the top of ball of 93 feet 6 inches. The foundation of the building is immensely strong, having 24 transverse walls, 2½ bricks thick. These walls run in pairs, at parallel widths, form the outside wall to within 25 feet 9 inches of the centre, which from the bed for the rails to lay on to receive the engines; and the walls are connected by an invert at the bottom, and a semi-arch at the top, which forms the bottom of ash-pits." The building has one entrance for the engines, which is at a point on the west side; and two smaller doorways for ordinary purposes.

Not far from the principal entrance is a large oven-formed fire-place for the purpose of supplying the engine with firing. At the opposite point is a substantial framework of wood, with buffers, to break any collision with the wall. In the centre is a large turn-table, 36 feet in diameter, where all the engines are run, to be turned into their respective berths, which are 23 in number, leaving the entrance clear.

This vast building has been designed under Mr. Robert Stephenson, by Mr. R. B. Dockray, the Company's resident engineer, and his assistant, Mr. Normanville.

The Insurrection in Sicily has been attended with so many striking incidents, that we have availed ourselves of the opportunity of engraving the prefixed Portraits of ten of the prime movers.

Our readers will doubtless remember that about the beginning of October, 600 young men, of the élite of the youth of Messina, in Sicily, formed the design of seizing the General and principal officers of the garrison, and keeping them as hostages until they should have obtained from the Government the political reforms that had been the object aimed at by the different pronunciamentos all over Sicily; and which has been attended with such ill success for the patriotic cause. These ten chief conspirators belong to the most respectable families of Messina; and, such is their opinion of the Neapolitan Government, that it is amongst them considered as a disgrace to accept under it any public, military, or civil office.

THE SICILIAN INSURGENTS.

The details of their capture are briefly as follows :—On a certain night, the General commanding the garrison of the Castle, with all his staff, had assembled at an hotel at an anniversary dinner, when the 600 insurgents surrounded the house, with the view of seizing on the company: they had, however, been betrayed by one of their party; and, just before the expected signal, troops who had been secretly sent for, descended from the Castle, and opened a terrific fire; the consequence of which was a general and dreadful conflict in the streets of Messina, attended with great bloodshed. The individuals whom we have portrayed, succeeded in making their escape into the mountains, where they wandered for some time, pursued not only by the police and military, but even by peasants, who had been allured by a proclamation, setting a reward of one thousand ducats upon the head of each of them.

After very many dangers, these unfortunate Sicilians succeeded in obtaining shelter under the British flag; but considerations, easily appreciated, will not allow us to give the name of the ship, nor of the gallant Captain, who saved from an ignominious death, and brought safe into England, these young men, who are, at this moment, sojourning, temporarily, in the metropolis.

RAILWAY INTELLIGENCE.

Railway Schemes for this Session.—There were thirty-seven railway bills suspended last session with the understanding that they should commence in this session at the stage they were suspended. Of these, thirteen were read a second time in the House of Lords, authorising capital to the extent of £4,004,000, and loans to the amount of £978,266; together, £4,982,266, for 165 miles of railway. There were twenty-four bills suspended in the Commons, of which twenty-one were at the stage for the consideration of the report, requiring a capital of £6,637,835, and loan £2,900,009; together £9,537,844 for 382 miles of railway. The total amount of capital and loan required for the suspended bills is, therefore, £14,520,110 to construct 547 miles of railway. Of these bills, those promoted by the Bristol and Exeter Company require capital and loan to the extent of £1,206,000, for 46 miles; by the Eastern Counties Company, £1,599,000, for 65 miles; by the South-Eastern Company, £2,532,000, for 84 miles; by the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire, £770,000, for 11 miles; by the Great Western, £800 000, for 36 miles; by the Great Northern, £400,000, for 36 miles; and by the London and South-Western, £3,393,666, for 124 miles. There are in all 140 notices of applications for bills this session—103 of them for new bills, o which eight are for new railways; 24 for new branches, 20 for deviations, 22 for extensions of time for the purchase of land and the completion of works, 27 to raise additional capital, 25 for leases and amalgamations, and four for dissolution.

Railway Bills—Depositing Day.—Tuesday, the last day allowed by act of Parliament for depositing plans and sections with the Commissioners of Railways, presented a strage contrast with the same anniversary of former years. Of the few companies who have deposited plans the greater part had got their business done quietly last week. A correct list of the lines to be applied for this season, now before us, enumerates only 118 English schemes, 15 Irish, and 5 Scotch; a large proportion relating to extensions, consolidations, &c.

Scottish Central Railway. The portion of this line between Stirling and Castlecary, is to be opened for general traffic on the 15th December, and arrangements have been made with the Edinburgh and Glasgow Company for the mutual accommodation of passengers. The whole line to Perth, it is expected, will be accomplished in March.

The Electric Telegraph.—It is a curious fact yet to be explained, that the electric telegraph will not work in the summit tunnel of the Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway. This tunnel was one of the severest pieces of boring that has been executed, and is the longest of English tunnels, not excepting that of Box on the Great Western.

Accident on the Boulogne Railway.—On Thursday evening, last week, the train on the Boulogne Railway being twenty minutes late, a locomotive, driven by an engine-man named O'Connell, was sent out from Neufchatel to meet it, and, if necessary, to lend assistance. Unfortunately, on the way, the man found that his steam was going off, and, getting down to stir up the fire, he lost some time. In order to regain it he dashed off at full speed; and when he arrived within sight of the coming train, he could not pull up in time. He came in consequence with great force against the train, and from the shock one of the stokers belonging to it was thrown to some distance and killed. The passengers felt a sharp shock, but nothing more. Immediately after the accident O'Connell disappeared and has not since been heard of.

Rapid Make of Iron.—Such is the celerity in manufacturing iron in the neighbourhood of Wolverhampton, that instances have occurred in which the calcined ore has been converted into rails, and actually delivered in Liverpool within two days. Bar and sheet iron can, of course, be manufactured with similar rapidity.

The passengers by the Eastern Counties Railway train, who so narrowly escaped destruction on the occasion of Ashcroft, who was lately convicted for the offence at the Central Criminal Court, having placed granite blocks on the rails at the approach of the train, have been so pleased with the presence of mind and judgment displayed by the engine-driver, William Young, in stopping the train, and by the subsequent exertions of the firemen and guards in capturing Ashcroft, that they have subscribed £8 8s. 6d., which has been presented to the men in equal shares, the Directors of the line giving £5 additional to Young.

At the November sessions of the Court of Assizes of the Seine, Paris, a notorious robber named Claude Tulbert and his gang, numbering fifty-eight criminals, of whom eleven were women, were brought to trial, and the majority convicted and sentenced to various periods of imprisonment and hard labour. The trial lasted a fortnight. Amongst those of the gang who have hitherto succeeded in eluding the vigilance of the officers of justice is an Englishman named Stone.

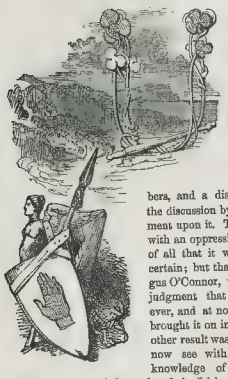
THE IRISH LEADERS.



NDOUBTEDLY the Repeal debate forced by Feargus O'Connor on Tuesday night was a failure: it was even worse than this, for many things that occurred in it will read at a distance like dislike of the whole body of Irish members, and a disposition to put down the discussion by tolerating no argument upon it. That the debate began with an oppressive sense on the minds of all that it was wholly useless, is certain; but that is the fault of Feargus O'Connor, who, with the want of judgment that makes him talk for ever, and at no time to any purpose, brought it on in such a form that any other result was impossible. Men may now see with what wisdom and knowledge of character O'Connell drummed him out of the ranks of the Irish members in 1832. The great leader "did see to the bottom of Master Shallow," and soon let him know that his place was outside a Legislature, within which something besides noise is required.

And in addition to the useless nature of the motion, and the wild, wandering speech of its mover, the subject has fallen upon evil days—a period, perhaps a passing one, of small men. The Legislature has to deal with most grim and pressing realities, both in England and Ireland. Bloodshed must be stopped—famine must be guarded against: we are driven to deal with expedients that meet the exigencies of the time. It is impossible to stop to inquire into the causes of a political revolution half a century distant. And when, after the discussion is forced on the Parliament, it becomes painfully apparent that the men who support it are unequal to the task; that to assist us in solving the difficulties of Ireland we have the assistance only of third-rate men and commonplace minds; then the uselessness, the emptiness, the weariness of the whole proceeding make attention to the arguments impossible.

The feeling crept over everybody, like an infection, or the influenza. The Irish members experienced it themselves; and Mr. Fagan did but express the secret thought of every one, when, adverting to the thin attendance in the early part of the evening, the apathy throughout it, and the impatience that broke forth loudly at the close, he regretted the question had been brought on at all. It was the first occasion when the void left by the death of O'Connell was fully felt. Men remembered the powerful intellect that once made the same question the fate of Ministries, and the means of wresting promises and conditions from a Throne, and asked themselves involuntarily—who has succeeded him? From the ranks of the Irish members there arose no answer, no indication that an answer is probable—as yet. Among a hundred and fifty men not one is found with any single gift of the many O'Connell possessed, and all to an extraordinary degree. If his abilities were distributed among any six men, they would all be eminent; combined in him, they made him great. It was the memory of O'Connell, and what he was on such occasions, that dwarfed the Irish members on Tuesday night into insignificance.

Service is no inheritance, says the proverb; neither is command. It is a natural, but fatal, mistake in the sons of men of genius to imagine that they can be what their father was. We meet the error in every walk of life. The English stage is at this moment overrun with the sons of good or great actors, who, thinking they have a right to eminence by virtue of their fathers' names, follow the same profession, with just that degree of success which gains toleration of their mediocrity. The sons of O'Connell, with the same mistaken ambition, are playing parts to which they are unequal: not one gift of their sire has descended to them—not even that of eloquence, which is so much oftener possessed by Irishmen than Englishmen. John O'Connell is cold, formal, and tedious in his style of speaking, with a manner singularly repellant of all sympathy with him or his subject. Maurice O'Connell has something in his voice that recalls the father, but that is all; Daniel O'Connell is nothing. The memory of a nation keeps them in a prominent public position; but a few years will weaken a tie that no deeds renew; and other champions than the O'Connells must arise.

Taking the debate of Tuesday by itself, it would seem that the question of Repeal has passed away from the list of existing things. It may be necessary to guard against an error here; the O'Connell phase of it has expired, but it will recur continually under new forms. In the House of Commons it had ceased to be a great question since 1835, yet it was not till seven years later that it became dangerous in Ireland itself, and compelled the Government to take military precautions, to prosecute and imprison O'Connell himself. And now, when a debate on it can hardly be kept alive in Parliament, we must not suppose the peril has past. Suppose it finds another O'Connell? The days of 1835 may then return, when a crowded Senate watched the conflict with breathless interest; when the debates, compared with the prosing of the present speakers, were like the wars of the giants; when O'Connell, in all his vigour, was met by Stanley, flushed and excited by applause. When they stood eminent above all, like

> Athos and Ida, with a dashing sea
> Of eloquence between, that flowed all free."

Such men compel attention; but, their successors complain that they do not get it. In that lies the secret. Let not Ireland suppose that the apathy and indifference of Tuesday night arose from aversion to the country or the people. It was the inevitable consequence of the inefficiency of its leaders. No assembly of men could ever withhold their attention from O'Connell; they might be excited to the wildest opposition, but indifferent they could not be while he spoke. And, if those who come after him have what but dead yawning apathy can be expected? Eloquence, great historic knowledge, overpowering legal learning, with the powers of combination and command —when a cause is deprived of all these, what is left but this dull repetition, and empty talk, from which men fly for refuge to forgetfulness of the subject altogether? Political questions only exist in the men that raise them from abstractions to realities: to do that requires a great man; and, among the present Irish leaders, we do not see one.
